Link with Britain 'stands above the rest; a model for the ties that should bind democracies'

Clinton to step up pressure for peace

By Martin Fletcher, U.S. editor, and Philip Webster, political editor

PRESIDENT CLINTON will fly to Belfast today to tell Sinn Fein and the Ulster Unionists that they must be prepared to make concessions for peace in Northern Ireland.

Mr Clinton, the first serving President to visit the Province, will call on all parties to accept the agreement for reviving the deadlocked peace process hammered out by John Major and John Bruton on Tuesday.

The President repeatedly threw his backing behind the deal during his day in London yesterday and tonight he will hold separate meetings with Gerry Adams of Sinn Fein and David Trimble of the Ulster Unionists in an attempt to build on the momentum created by his visit.

He is understood to have promised Mr Major in private talks yesterday morning that he would keep up the pressure for a lasting settlement now that the two Prime Ministers have agreed a "twin-track" process to set up an international commission on disarming the terrorists while their Governments hold preliminary discussions with the political parties aimed at bringing them all to the negotiating table by February.

Standing on the steps of 10 Downing Street, Mr Clinton turned the screw on Mr Adams and the IRA, saying: "My message to the IRA is that the twin-track process has provided a mechanism for all the parties honourably now to bring their concerns to the table and be heard. In the end peace means peace and we are all going to have to support that."

He added: "I cannot say enough to the British people about how much I appreciate and admire the Prime Minister in taking this kind of risk for peace." The agreement was the best opportunity he had seen to resolve the impasse over disarming the IRA: "It should be embraced and I think it will be."

Mr Clinton with Mr Major in Downing Street yesterday

Mr Clinton flew into Britain with his wife, Hillary, only hours after Mr Major and Mr Bruton had set the seal on their deal, and he was swiftly at Downing Street for two hours of talks with Mr Major. He also paid courtesy calls on the Queen and Tony Blair before addressing both Houses of Paliament. There, he reaffirmed the "special relationship" between Britain and America, which he said, "stands alone, unbroken, above all the rest; a model for the ties that should bind all democracies".

Mr Major acknowledged yesterday that Mr Clinton's visit had played an important part in clinching the Ulster deal — it had "concentrated the mind" — and he went on to urge all political leaders in the Province to be ready "to take risks for peace".

He told the Commons that the tight timetable set for the start of all-party talks meant a serious commitment from all concerned. He said: "We are ready to make that commitment. But the British and Irish Governments cannot make peace in Northern Ireland. Our role in the process is to facilitate it. We have borne a great deal of the burden. We have been ready to take risks for peace. Now is the time for others to do so as well."

Mr Major also held out an olive branch to the Unionists, who had dismissed the deal as a fudge, promising to keep an open mind on their plan for an elected assembly to play a part in the search for peace.

Invitations to party leaders to take part in the preparatory talks would go out in the next few days, Mr Major said. "Now is the time for all parties and groups to make a sincere and constructive contribution — for the paramilitaries on both sides to give not merely qualified verbal assurances, but a real and tangible commitment to peace...for all political parties to enter the preparatory talks, not with rigid and irreconcilable postures, but with a will to make them work."

The former American Senator George Mitchell, who is to lead the international commission on disarming the paramilitaries, joined Mr Clinton in Downing Street yesterday and he said afterwards that he would move promptly to get his body organised. He is expected to be assisted by the former Finnish Prime Minister Esko Aho and Lewis MacKenzie, the Canadian general who served as UN commander in the former Yugoslavia.

Last night, however, the differences between London and Dublin about how Mr Mitchell's body should operate remained, with Mr Major adamant that it would not consider the so-called Washington Three condition that requires the IRA to start giving up its guns before entering all-party talks.

He told MPs: "This is not a matter of dogma, but of practicality. No one has yet found an alternative way of providing confidence. If they mean peace, they don't need guns and semtex."

Nevertheless, Mr Mitchell, who suggested that he would talk directly to the IRA, did not rule out the possibility yesterday that he might make a recommendation on the condition, although Mr Clinton was careful not to take sides. "It is not for us to get into the details of the judgments that the countries and the parties will have to make," he said.

The President is expected to have a private meeting with Mr Adams during a reception at Queen's University tonight and to urge him to seize this opportunity to put the peace process back on track. He will deliver the same message to the more hardline Unionist leaders who also have deep reservations about the deal.

Tony Lake, Mr Clinton's national security adviser, telephoned both Mr Adams and Mr Trimble on Tuesday night to press them, with apparent success, not to reject the agreement out of hand. Mr Adams promised yesterday to approach it in a positive way in the hope it could provide a basis for peace.

The biggest security headache for the President's visit to Belfast today is not, however, likely to be the meeting with the party leaders. Rather, it will come when he switches on the Christmas tree lights outside the City Hall.

Thousands of people are expected to turn out to see him, and every one will be screened. The Belfast rock star Van Morrison and the American saxophonist Curtis Stigers will both play at the ceremony and Morrison's songs will include Days Like This, which has been used by the Northern Ireland Office to promote the peace process. Morrison played at the inauguration of the President, who joined him in a jam session. There were hopes that there might be a repeat performance tonight.

USS Churchill relaunches the special relationship

From Tom Rhodes in Washington and Emma Wilkins

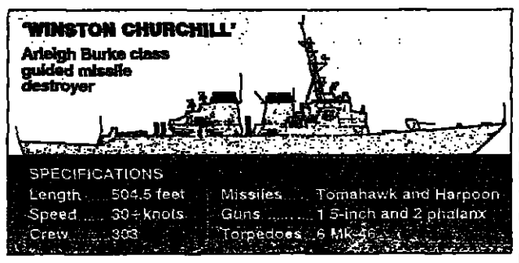

WINSTON CHURCHILL became only the second Englishman to grace the hull of an American ship yesterday when President Clinton announced that the wartime leader would be immortalised on the US Navy's latest warship, an honour previously accorded King Alfred in 1775.

In a symbolic signal of rapprochement after months of fragile Anglo-American relations, Mr Clinton told the both Houses of Parliament that the vessel, an Arleigh Burke class guided-missile destroyer, would become one of the most powerful in service.

"I am pleased to announce here, the home of British freedom, that the United States will name one of the newest and most powerful of its surface ships, a guided-missile destroyer, the United States Ship Winston Churchill," he said.

"When the ship slides down the ways in the final year of this century, its name will ride the seas as a reminder for the coming century of an indomitable man who shaped our age, who stood always for freedom, who showed anew the glorious strength of the human spirit."

Construction of the new vessel, hull number DDG-81, will begin in the spring of 1997 and Winston Churchill will join the American fleet in 2000. As the 31st of 32 such vessels authorised by Congress, the multi-mission ship will become part of a revolutionary fleet equipped with the latest technology and designed to operate both independently as an "offensive platform" and to support aircraft carrier and amphibious operations.

Its combination of Aegis, the anti-submarine warfare system, Tomahawk and Harpoon missiles, 5 inch gun and two 20mm Phalanx guns as well as helicopter hangars and six MK-46 torpedoes make the Burke class among the most advanced destroyers in the world.

While Britain maintains a ship-naming committee at the Admiralty, responsibility for the naming of US naval vessels falls on the shoulders of the Navy Secretary, now John Dalton, in consultation with the Chief of Naval Operations.

It seemed certain yesterday, however, that the personal hand of Mr Clinton had played heavily in the department's decision to choose the wartime Prime Minister. Privately, officials said the President wished to make a specific gesture during his visit to Britain. "The President wanted to release this information himself in front of the British Parliament," said one Pentagon official, "It was kept a very close secret before the visit."

Naval historians in Washington said yesterday that the Alfred, an armed merchantman, was the last vessel bearing an English name when commissioned by the Continental Navy in December 1775.

The Royal Navy uses the Ships Names and Badges Committee to decide on names for ships and submarines. In America, the navy tends to name ships after famous people. The USS Ronald Reagan is due to go into service in 2002.

Home loan cuts raise City hopes of lower base rate

By Nicholas Wood and Janet Bush

MORTGAGE rates fell last night in anticipation of a pre-Christmas interest rate cut after Kenneth Clarke's cautious Budget.

The Halifax, the country's biggest building society, set the ball rolling by trimming 0.25 per cent off its variable rate from 7.99% to 7.74%. Abbey National followed suit with a a 0.2 per cent reduction and Northern Rock and Britannia also announced cuts. Other lenders said they were reviewing their position.

The Halifax move reduced the monthy payments on a £50,000 repayment mortgage by £7.37 and on a £100,000 loan by £15.67.

The building societies' move coincided with a call by the Confederation of British Industry for an immediate 0.5 cut in base rates from 6.75 per cent to 6.25 per cent.

The financial markets were gleeful at the prospect of rate cuts. The FTSE 100 closed at a record high of 3,655.5 and government bonds also marched higher.

The mortgage rate cuts highlighted hopes in the City that the tight Budget on Tueday had left the door open to lower base rates. The Chancellor next meets the Governor of the Bank of England on December 13 and many economists believe that a rate cut could be announced then. Mr Clarke emphasised in interviews and briefings yesterday his determination to cut public sector borrowing — a hint that a rate cut is in his sights.

But he was scathing about his critics on the Tory backbenches and in the press, saying that MPs were "mad" if they thought he should take risks with the public sector borrowing requirement. Supposedly Conservative newspapers had harboured "unreal expectations" about the Budget and had wrongly imagined he was a "cut and run Chancellor" happy to bribe the electorate, he said.

The public would have seen through such a strategy, Mr Clarke told reporters at the Treasury.

However, Mr Clarke did say that he would cut taxes further in next year's Budget if it was sensible to do so.

The Institute for Fiscal Studies disputed the Government's claim that the Budget left the average British family £9 better off. The real figure, the IFS said, is £2.20. The lowest 20 per cent of earners had been left worse off by the Budget measures while the top 10 per cent of earners were £7.30 a week better off.

Sinn Fein reaffirms 'invested interest' in achieving negotiated peace settlement

Ulster parties soften initial criticism

By Nicholas Watt
Ireland Correspondent

UNIONISTS and Sinn Fein gave wary responses to the Anglo-Irish communiqué.

David Trimble, leader of the Ulster Unionists, initially said the agreement was an objectionable fudge, although he later welcomed the Anglo-Irish pledge to examine his proposal for an elected assembly in Northern Ireland.

Gerry Adams, the Sinn Fein leader, also said the communiqué was a fudge, and called on Britain to drop its demand for the IRA to decommission some arms before all-party talks. However, he said Sinn Fein would examine the proposals in a positive light.

Mr Trimble's first response was to accuse Britain of bowing to pressure from Washington. He told BBC radio: "We had all this rushing about and a press conference so that John Major could meet Bill Clinton and say: 'What a good boy I am. I have done what you told me'. Isn't that rather a shameful position for a British Prime Minister."

Later, however, he took heart when Mr Major told the Commons that the IRA would have to decommission some arms before all-party talks. Mr Trimble said his party would continue to talk to the Government about issues such as his plans for an elected assembly.

Mr Adams accused Britain of subverting the peace process and said that the twin-track process would work only if Britain dropped its demand for the IRA to decommission its arms. He added, however: "Whether or not [the communiqué] has the potential to move us all forward will have to be seen. But Sinn Fein have a deeply invested interest in bringing a negotiated peace settlement."

How the logjam was broken this week

AFTER days of frantic telephone diplomacy John Major and John Bruton suddenly announced an agreement on Budget Day that will allow the next stage of the Northern Ireland peace process to get under way. Philip Webster explains how the logjam was broken and looks at the prospects for further progress.

Question: What is the twin-track process?

Answer: It is the plan, due to have been launched at the aborted Chequers summit in September, to allow preliminary talks with all the main parties and the two Governments to proceed, while an international body looks at arms decommissioning.

Q: What is Washington Three?

A: It is the requirement set out by Sir Patrick Mayhew in Washington that the IRA must start giving up weapons before Sinn Fein is allowed into substantive all-party talks.

Q: What went wrong in September?

A: Dublin pulled out after miscalculating Britain's position on Washington Three. John Bruton mistakenly believed that London would drop the requirement because it was excluded from the proposed communiqué.

Q: Does London still stand firm on Washington Three?

A: Yes, and Mr Major reiterated it several times yesterday. But Dublin does not, as John Bruton made plain on Tuesday night. John Hume, the SDLP leader, and Dick Spring, the Irish Foreign Minister, also back Sinn Fein's opposition to it. Britain has said it will look at alternative "confidence-building" measures, but it cannot see any at the moment.

Q: So how could both sides sign the communiqué?

A: They agreed to differ. London says the remit in Paragraph Seven is to identify and advise on a decommissioning method, and to report on whether there is a commitment by the IRA to work for that aim. Thus, it says, Washington Three is excluded. Mr Bruton points to Paragraph Five, which speaks of the international body providing an "independent assessment" of decommissioning.

Q: So what has changed since September?

A: Not a lot. London has given a firm target date for the start of all-party talks: February. Previously it was an aspiration. The international body, to be chaired by the former US Senator George Mitchell, will now not "oversee" the decommissioning of arms. Instead it will advise on a suitable method. London has accepted that Sinn Fein can raise what it likes with the commission.

The preliminary talks process has been widened to allow the Unionists to talk about their plan for an elected assembly and Sinn Fein about other confidence-building measures. It is here that they might be asked to produce other evidence of their good faith, such as halting punishment beatings.

Q: Why a deal now?

A: Because President Clinton was about to arrive. In the summer he said he did not want to go to Belfast just to switch on the Christmas tree. Dublin was desperate to get an agreement before he arrived to enable him to continue the backstairs pressure on Sinn Fein. Sinn Fein's surprisingly favourable response late on Tuesday and early yesterday spoke volumes.

Q: Does Mr Clinton back Washington Three?

A: In private, possibly. Publicly to ally himself with it would be to take London's side.

Q: Will the Unionists boycott the preparatory talks?

A: No. They will talk to the two Governments about their assembly proposals. But they will not sit down with Sinn Fein.

Q: Will the February target be met?

A: Unlikely. Only a massive change of attitudes on all sides would allow round-table talks to get under way by then.

Straight man steals the pantomime show

MATTHEW PARRIS
POLITICAL SKETCH

Nearly all the Williams were there. Waiting for President Bill in the Royal Gallery of the House of Peers were four other famous Williams. William I, a gilded statue, stood at the door. In oils, the portraits of the Williams II, III and IV peered dispassionately down from the walls at this presidential Willie-come-lately to the hall of fame. The boy who will one day (God willing) be King William V, being at Eton, was unable to attend.

Presidents and Kings have their paths smoothed before them. Mr Clinton breezed in to the sound of trumpets, found a crowd assembled for his address, gave it, and breezed out again. Sketch-writers, however, had been waiting an hour.

We amused ourselves trying to spot which cameramen were in fact secret service agents. My Guardian colleague, Simon Hoggart, was convinced that holes had been cut in the eyes of William IV, while I am equally sure I saw the statue of King Alfred move.

Sketchwriters think alike. Hoggart and I looked around at the chandeliers, gilt, flock wallpaper and fevered decor of the Royal Gallery. We pulled out our notebooks. The Guardian sketchwriter wrote "Indian restaurant"; your own wrote "Louisiana brothel". Mr Clinton will be spared the former on his visit here, and will surely never have seen the latter.

Before the President came the dignified part of the British constitution, Black Rod, in silk and lace, with billiard cue. Then came the even more dignified part of the constitution, the Baroness Thatcher. In hot pursuit came the undignified part of the constitution, George Foulkes (Lab, Carrick, Cumnock & Doon Valley); and, moments later, the efficient part of the constitution, House Leader Tony Newton.

Also present was the invented part of the constitution, Deputy Prime Minister Michael Heseltine. Tony Blair, looking tense, arrived early, and waited.

Even the photographers were wearing ties. One of them straightened his as the pantomime part of the constitution, the Lord Chancellor and Madam Speaker, processed forward in funereal tights and gilded brocade, knocking 'em cold in black and gold.

And we were ready. A fanfare of what sounded like antique cornets rent the air, the noise being similar to that of a New York traffic jam. Maybe this was to help Mr Clinton feel at home. He rose to speak.

The President spoke well. Surrounded by all the ridiculous flim-flam of invented British antiquity, Lord Chancellor in ludicrous fancy dress, the backdrop of unspeakable Victoriana whose excesses America escaped, Mr Clinton appeared as one from a quieter and deeper-rooted tradition.

In plain grey suit, single-breasted, he spoke calmly, in tones more thoughtful and less showy than our British appetite for political theatre expects. It was a beautifully crafted speech: relaxed, considered, delivered with poise. I felt ashamed to reflect that the US President was the least vulgar thing in the room. America was restrained, understated; Britain, as ever, pantomime.

Madam Speaker thanked him. The three ships, she said, which had taken the early settlers to America, had summed up, in their names, every settler's hopes: "Godspeed, Discovery and the Susan Constant." Susan must have been quite a girl.

Madam Speaker also quoted Thomas Jefferson, revealing that he was her hero. She did not mention that he insisted on sleeping with his slaves. As Miss Boothroyd and her retinue departed, her train-bearer looked distinctly nervous.

Mitchell: reputation for being partisan

Mildness conceals a ferocity

THE British Government should be wary of George Mitchell, the American who will chair the new independent body that must determine whether the IRA and other paramilitary groups are genuinely committed to disarming and how that might be achieved.

Mr Mitchell is of Irish Catholic stock (Martin Fletcher writes). He encouraged President Clinton to give Gerry Adams a US visa in January last year despite London's vehement objections. And beneath his mild, self-effacing manner the former Democratic leader of the US Senate is also ferociously partisan: members of President Bush's Republican administration claim he did all in his power to frustrate their agenda.

MAN IN THE NEWS

Mr Mitchell, 62, the son of a janitor of Irish descent and a Lebanese-born factory worker, helped to manage the 1972 presidential campaign of Edmund Muskie, the Maine senator, who when he was appointed US Secretary of State in 1980, named Mr Mitchell to fill his Senate seat.

Two things propelled Mr Mitchell into the Senate leadership in 1989. He had helped his party to regain control of the Senate in 1986, and the following year he had refused to be browbeaten by Oliver North during the Iran-Contra hearings. Along the way he divorced his wife of 28 years in 1987. He is now married to Heather MacLachlan, 25 years his junior, who runs a sports marketing firm.

Adviser plays decisive role behind scenes

From Martin Fletcher in Washington

AS AIR FORCE ONE took off from Washington on Tuesday night President Clinton presented a bottle of champagne to Tony Lake, his National Security Adviser, to thank him for his role in promoting the breakthrough in the peace process the British and Irish Prime Ministers had just announced at Downing Street.

The President was thrilled by the 11th-hour development that ensured the best possible start to his visit to Britain and Ireland — a visit designed at least partly to woo the substantial Irish-American vote before next year's presidential election. Mr Lake and other White House aides had worked intensely behind the scenes to bring it about, and had finally succeeded.

The administration publicly played down its role in deference to the sensibilities of the British and Irish governments. Mr Clinton using his appearances yesterday to lavish praise on John Major and John Bruton. Mr Major conceded only that the President's imminent visit had "concentrated the mind". But America, with its President having made Northern Ireland one of his foreign policy priorities, was a far more important player than that.

For the past two months the White House has been privately pushing, cajoling and counselling all parties, trying to line them up behind some modified form of Britain's twin-track proposals. Within minutes of Tuesday night's Downing Street announcement Mr Lake telephoned Gerry Adams, the Sinn Fein leader, and David Trimble, the Ulster Unionist Party leader, urging them not to reject the agreement out of hand.

Mr Lake was said at times to have been exasperated by Britain's intransigence over the decommissioning of IRA weapons. However, British sources suggested the US had put particular pressure on Sinn Fein, arguing that Mr Adams had reneged on his promise seriously to discuss decommissioning in return for Mr Clinton letting him raise funds in America.

Mr Adams has visited the White House three times since September and one senior US official acknowledged the White House had gone to considerable lengths to persuade Sinn Fein that twin-track was a reasonable compromise not some secret trap.

All the key players — nationalist and unionist — were invited to White House meetings with Vice-President Gore or Mr Lake this autumn. Mr Lake and Nancy Soderberg, his Irish affairs expert, spent a week in Britain and Ireland late last month trying to break the deadlock over decommissioning. There were countless transatlantic telephone calls, Mr Clinton speaking directly with Mr Bruton last Thursday and Mr Lake with Dick Spring, the Irish Foreign Minister, last Saturday.

One senior administration official said the US had been "supportive, encouraging, offering ideas that could be helpful, offering to help provide feedback to the various parties on what we thought was a reasonable proposal". The US had helped to "stimulate creative thinking".

America's involvement is now more important than ever. Mr Clinton has won Sinn Fein's trust. He must now use that trust to persuade Sinn Fein to endorse the twin-track agreement.

Yawning gap in American President's charisma gives security guards an easy day

Monumental motorcade underwhelms Londoners

BY ALAN HAMILTON AND JAMES LANDALE

YOU can tell when the eagle has landed. A motorcade the length of a train zips through the bleary traffic and nobody takes a blind bit of notice, except to swear at the hold-ups.

It takes charisma in spades to draw Londoners to the crush barriers to gawp at a foreign dignitary. Pope John Paul II and Mikhail Gorbachev were the last visitors with it. The 42nd President of the United States, who is known to his security men as "Eagle", hasn't got it, really. The crowds watching his noisy progress yesterday were a touch on the thin side.

Air Force One deposited Bill and Hillary at 7.07am at the far side of Heathrow where paying passengers never go. A helicopter immediately whisked them to the official residence of Admiral William J. Crowe, the US Ambassador, in Regent's Park, where they had a little under an hour to freshen up before a day of talks with John Major, a courtesy call on the Queen, a meeting with Tony Blair, and a reception and dinner at Downing Street.

But first the Clintons boarded their motorcade of 17 vehicles, including a personal ambulance and a security vehicle bristling with domes and aerials. The Clintons rode in the second car, a vast black Cadillac with the flags of the US and of the President fluttering at the wings. If they are so paranoid about the President's security, why do they advertise him so blatantly?

Their first stop was at Westminster Abbey shortly before 9am, where they were met by John and Norma Major and laid a wreath at the tomb of the unknown soldier.

Shaved, breakfasted and clearly recovered from any lingering jet lag, the President decided to attempt a walkabout. It was drizzling a bit, which was not a good omen.

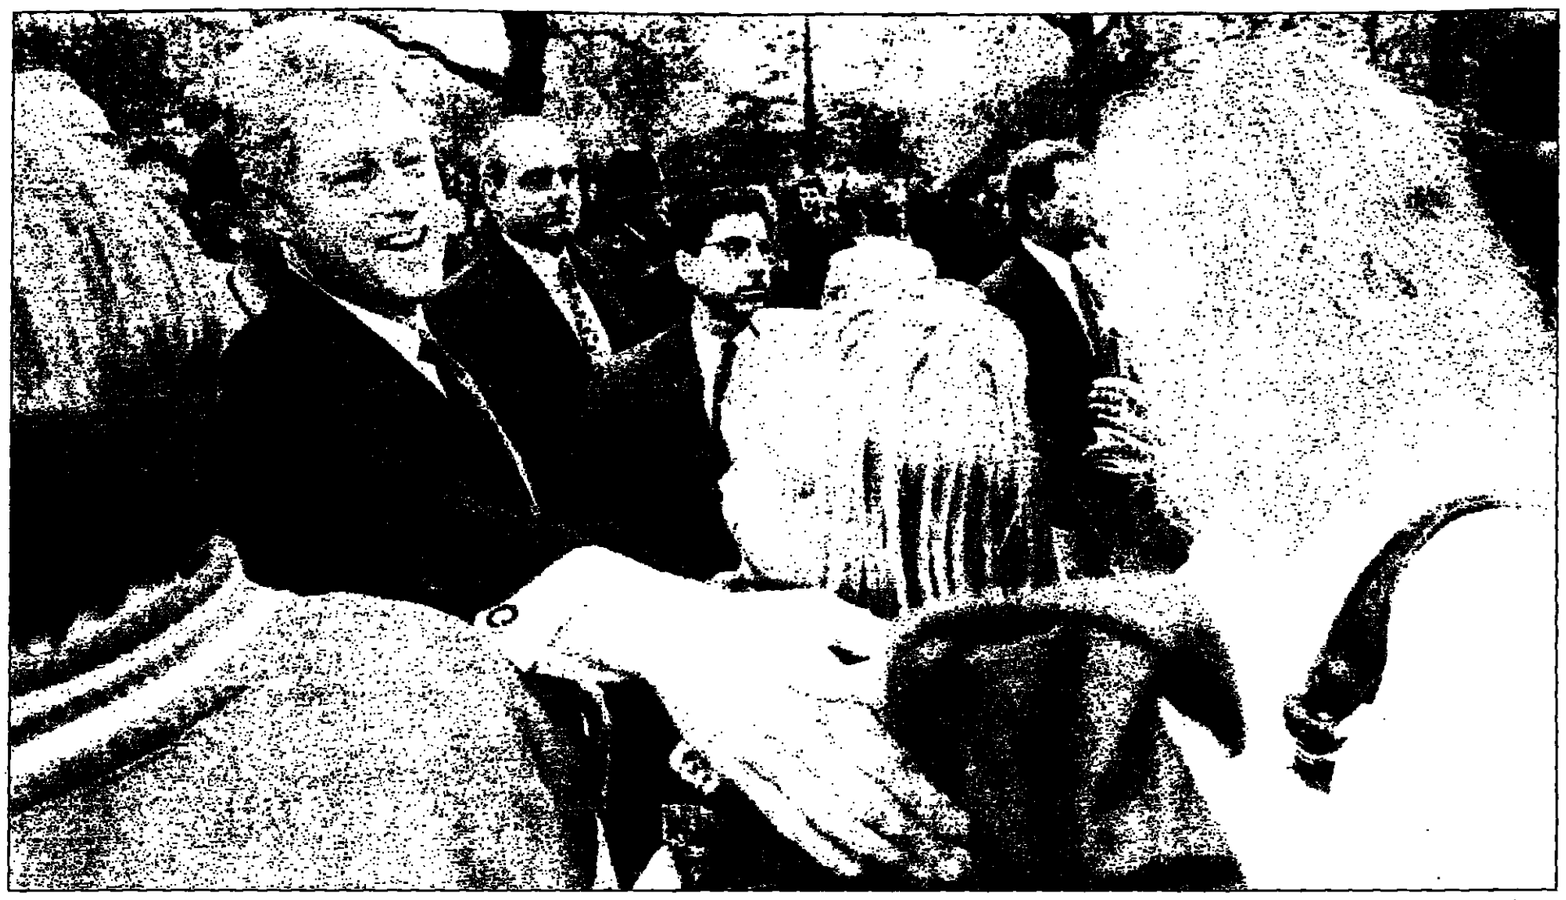

Bill, Hillary and John struck off across the street in the direction of Central Hall, surrounded by at least 70 security men and a huge pack of journalists. It was rather like the picture of George Washington surrounded by a phalanx of protection against King George's Redcoats.

Mr Clinton waved a lot, signed an occasional autograph for startled passers-by, and talked to a pair of tourists, who by some miraculous coincidence turned out to be Bob Mulholland and Kelly Candale, Democratic Party activists from California. Their banner, "We love you, Clinton", may have given the game away. "Hi," the President said, several times.

He then found himself confronting a television camera and reporter, and instantly steeled himself for a searching question on Northern Ireland. It came at once. "What, Mr President, is your favourite Beatles number?" The President did not answer, and his fixed smile remained impeccably untroubled. Mr Major, however, could not contain a bit of a snigger.

The moment was saved by some cheery building workers digging an enormous hole for the Jubilee Line extention. "Hi, Bill," they shouted. At this undemanding approach, Mr Clinton went up and shook their hands.

"He's got a good firm handshake," Paul Wydenbach, 28, reported afterwards. "Obviously he's no tart."

President Clinton during his walkabout in the drizzle at Westminster, where he met children from the American School in St John's Wood, north London

President Clinton will perform with the Belfast-born singer Van Morrison, above, today after switching on the city's Christmas lights (David Sinclair writes). Like the President, Morrison is an occasional saxophonist. He is also gruff, cagey, notoriously irascible and one of the most distinctive singers the United Kingdom has produced. He celebrated his 50th birthday this year with a top-five album, Days Like This. His new album, How Long Has This Been Going On?, is released on Monday.

Mrs Clinton and Mrs Major at Westminster Abbey

Determined First Lady refuses to take second billing to Bill

BY ALICE THOMSON, POLITICAL REPORTER

HILLARY CLINTON swept into a rain-drenched London yesterday, bringing with her an army of aides, diplomats, journalists and her husband, the President of the United States.

The First Lady had hardly got off Air Force One before she was making clear that she was here in her own right and would not make do with a little smalltalk with the wives and being a clothes horse.

Dressed in steely royal blue, with her hair pulled back in a chic bun, she glared as a reporter asked her who her designer was. She looked even more horrified when someone asked her why she had not bought her cat Socks to meet Humphrey, his Downing Street equivalent. She finally smiled when she has handed a vast bunch of flowers.

Bill and Hillary spent a quick hour with Norma and John touring Westminster Abbey before the foursome broke up. Last time Mrs Clinton came to Britain she was excluded from the bilateral summit at Chequers. This time she had come to do some serious networking.

Everyone had been warned that she loathes meeting "salon women". Thus a list of 20 of Britain's most eminent females had been chosen to meet her. Gillian Shephard, the Education Secretary, was a guest of honour and others included Baroness Blackstone, the Labour peer, Sue MacGregor, presenter of Today on Radio 4, Judith Newman, a literature professor from Newcastle University, Sue Slipman, director of the National Training and Enterprise Council, and Ruth Evans, the director of the National Consumer Council.

The women gathered round a table in the state dining room of the American Ambassador's residence in Regent's Park and Mrs Clinton told them: "It would be of great interest to me to trade thoughts or ideas you might have about common interests, particularly among women.

"I try to do this in every country I visit and I always come away thinking we have so much more in common than the things which separate us."

She then picked her husband up from 10 Downing Street and they headed to the Houses of Parliament for his address. Later the couple went for tea with the Queen at Buckingham Palace.

PC Mullin: invitation to meet the President

In the evening Mrs Clinton attended the dinner at Downing Street and invited her long-lost cousin David Howell, a pensioner from Exeter, for cocktails. Also there was PC Laurie Mullin, who had shown Mr and Mrs Clinton and their daughter, Chelsea, around the Commons six years ago.

PC Mullin, 58, of Barking, east London, said the invitation to attend the reception at the American Ambassador's residence came out of the blue. "In 1985 I took a family from Arkansas round the Commons. They happened to be friends of the Clintons and so they gave him my name when he came over here some years before he went to the White House."

☐ As first ladies their styles could not be more different. Norma Major prefers to take the back seat, staying in the country and writing biographies of opera singers. Hillary Clinton is a potent political force in her own right. On sartorial matters, however, both women are as one (Julia Llewellyn Smith writes).

Yesterday, they showed an enthusiastic appreciation of the frumpy "geek chic" which the fashion world attempted to foist upon the public at the last collections.

Mrs Clinton, obviously wary of the British winter, had chosen to wrap herself in what looked like an old car blanket, her chest snugly protected by a violet polo neck. Mrs Major sported a cream silk, double-breasted jacket and charcoal skirt.

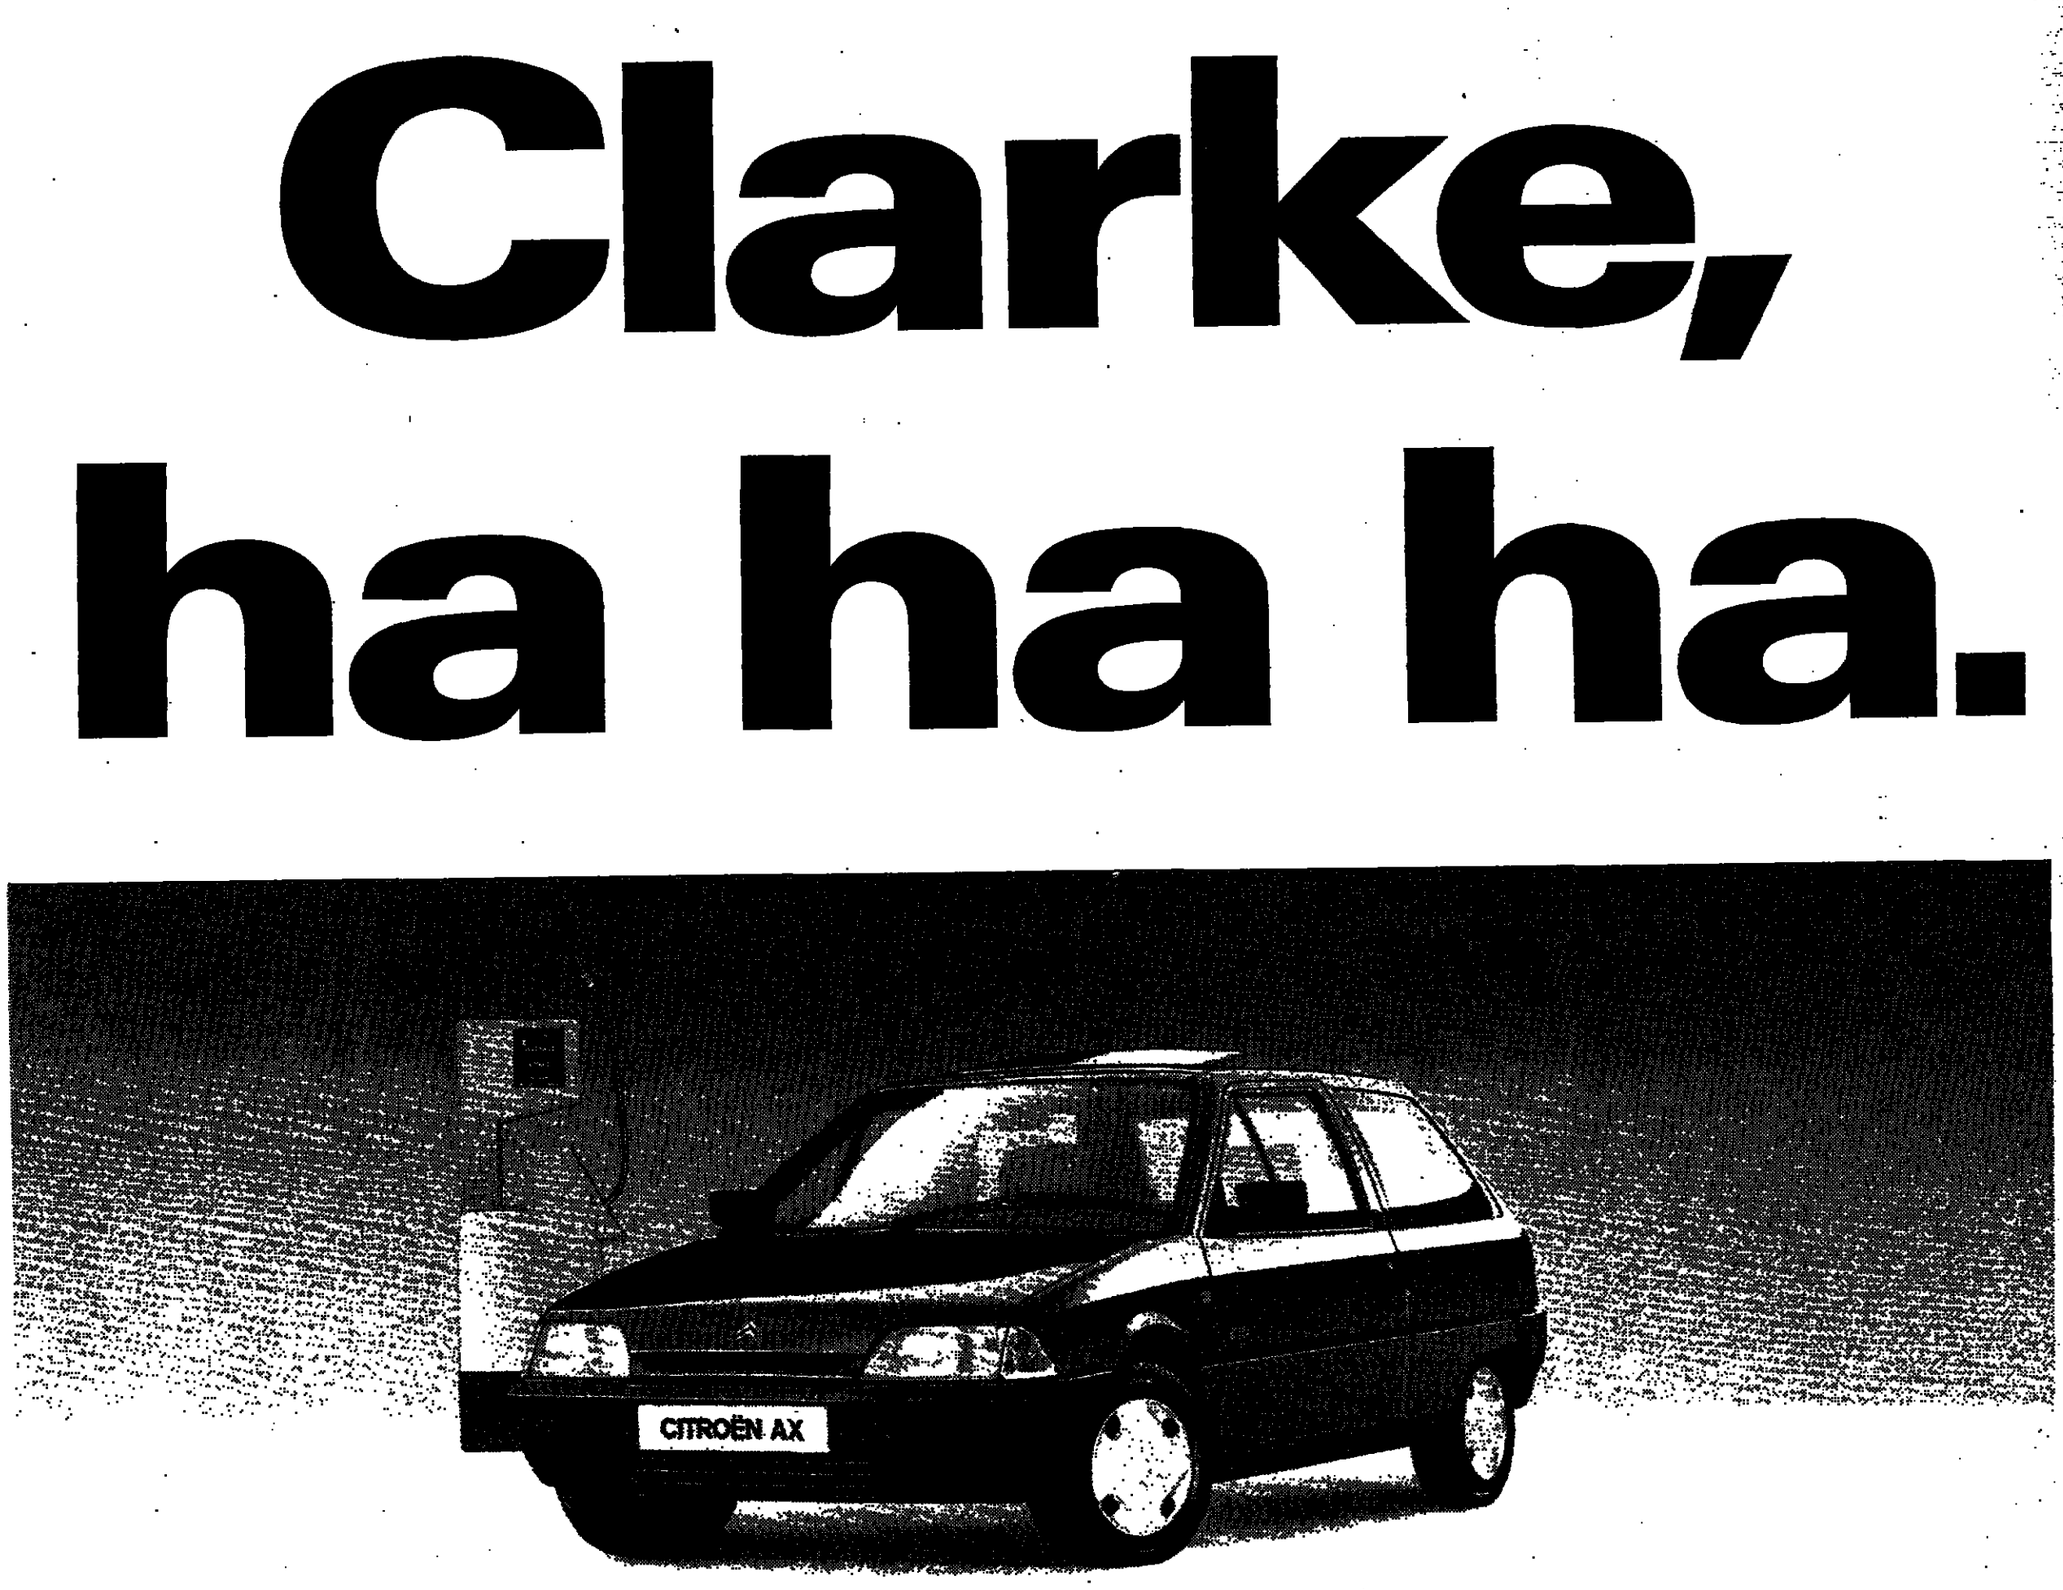

Both women's skirts fell exactly on the knee, an ultra-fashionable length. Black sheer tights and court shoes completed the ensembles.

Judge bans further publicity over boy in kidnap disputes

Father who abducted his son wins custody fight

BY RICHARD DUCE

OLIVER MALKIN, the 14-year-old boy at the centre of an acrimonious custody battle that has seen him kidnapped at least three times, will be allowed to stay with his father, a judge ruled yesterday.

Peter Malkin, who once abducted his son and took him to Egypt, was granted custody because Oliver's natural mother, Elisa Pridmore, 38, recently died from cancer. Oliver has since been living with her relatives. He will remain a ward of court.

After a two-hour closed hearing at the High Court in London yesterday the judge called reporters into the court to prohibit the publication or soliciting of information about the case.

Mr Justice Kirkwood said: "Following upon the untimely and tragic death of Oliver's mother on the 12th of October the decision has been taken that Oliver will make his home with his father. That decision accords with Oliver's own wishes. It also accords with advice the court has received as to how Oliver's welfare may best be served.

"Though living with his father, Oliver will remain in close contact, by regular visits, with members of his late mother's family. They are dear to him.

"These are gravely distressing days for Oliver as he mourns his mother and faces up to making major adjustments in every aspect of his life. Recent publicity has been particularly upsetting for him. Any further publicity about these matters beyond this short statement would be disastrous. Both publication and the soliciting of information by anyone about this case are prohibited by statute and by order of this court."

Mr Malkin, 55, runs a country club near Canterbury. His refusal to accept that his former wife should have custody of Oliver began after they divorced in 1989. She remarried and moved to France. Oliver was once found hidden in the attic of Mr Malkin's home after he had been missing for 19 months. Mr Malkin took his son again after he stepped off a bus in France.

The pair were on the run for two months before they were traced to Egypt in 1993. Mr Malkin later served eight months of an 18-month jail sentence for contempt of court. He said recently that he had made his peace with his ex-wife before she died during an emotional meeting in Tunbridge Wells. Oliver had come over from France with his mother and stepfather and Mr Malkin was joined by his girlfriend Kate Donnelly.

"We all held hands. There were a lot of tears all round as well as kind thoughts and words," Mr Malkin said at the time. "Oliver knew his mum was going to die. But he was so happy to see his father and mother make it up before she died. I'd have given anything to have been reunited with Oliver under different circumstances. This way there are no winners. Everyone will have lost something."

He made no comment after the hearing yesterday.

Let coma patient die with dignity, doctor asks court

BY A STAFF REPORTER

A WOMAN who suffered brain damage after a drug overdose almost four years ago should be allowed to die "peacefully and with dignity", her doctor told a court yesterday. Dr Iain O'Brien said that Janet Johnstone, 52, had irreparable brain damage and no hope of recovery.

The Court of Session in Edinburgh is hearing an application by Law NHS Trust Hospital, Strathclyde, backed by Mrs Johnstone's family, for permission to remove the feeding tube keeping her alive.

The judge, Lord Cameron of Lochbroom, was told that Mrs Johnstone was taken to hospital on January 14, 1992, after taking a cocktail of drugs. She told the doctor on duty that "she had been unhappy for a long time and was very nervous".

She had a seizure lasting about ten minutes and suffered another before she was transferred to another hospital for further treatment. Dr O'Brien said that by the time she returned to Law Hospital she had suffered brain damage. Since then, she had been kept alive with intensive nursing. She could breathe unaided, but was fed through a tube in her nose.

Dr O'Brien, a neurologist, said she was in a persistent vegetative state. "In view of the absence of any improvement in her level of consciousness, it is clear that the prognosis is hopeless."

In March 1993 he spoke to Mrs Johnstone's husband Peter and daughter Linda about the possibility of allowing her to die. The daughter reluctantly accepted the advice, but Mr Johnstone said he hoped his wife would recover. Finally in February 1994 the relatives said they were now in favour of removing the feeding tube.

Dr Richard Metcalfe, a consultant neurologist at Glasgow Southern General Hospital, who was called in for a second opinion, said he knew of no case where there had been an improvement in a patient who had been in such a state for so long. The case continues today.

Footballer fined for possessing heroin

A PROFESSIONAL footballer arrested in an undercover police operation was fined £500 yesterday for possessing heroin. Anthony Finnigan, who plays for third division Fulham, was sitting in the back of what he later learnt was an unmarked police car when officers arrested him.

One kilogram of heroin worth £100,000 was found in the vehicle. A drugs courier, Susan Ellis, 27, who was also there, was later jailed for 4½ years for possession with intent to supply. Finnigan was acquitted of the charge but admitted possessing 0.35 grams of the drug.

Ian Darling, for the prosecution, told Southwark Crown Court during the player's trial earlier this month that Finnigan told police the drug was for personal use. The court heard that Finnigan was arrested as he allegedly joined Ellis in trying to sell the one-kilogram consignment to an officer posing as a dealer.

Outside court, Finnigan, 33, of Tulse Hill, south London, said he would be explaining the incident to the Football Association.

Assisted places subsidy excludes prep schools

By John O'Leary
Education Editor

PREPARATORY schools were unexpectedly excluded from plans announced yesterday to extend state subsidies to independent school children under the age of 11.

John Major has promised to double the 30,000 places in the Assisted Places Scheme for children from low-income families. An extra £11 million was allocated to the programme in Tuesday's Budget.

The existing places, which are restricted to 11-year-olds and above at some 300 independent schools, have never been fully taken up. Preparatory schools had been expected to join the scheme to ensure that the shortfall did not continue.

However, under-11s will qualify only in the junior departments of all-through independent schools, Gillian Shephard, the Education and Employment Secretary, announced. She said she expected most new places to be provided — as at present — for 11-year-olds. Some 250 independent schools have been invited to join the scheme, including specialist music and ballet schools.

The decision enraged preparatory school heads, who will discuss their response at a meeting today. John Morris, the general secretary of the Incorporated Association of Preparatory Schools, said: "I shall be very surprised if our council does not express disappointment on the part of the four fifths of members who would have welcomed the opportunity to participate in the scheme."

About 100 IAPS members will benefit from the extension as junior departments of independent schools. But the remaining 400 will face extra competition for pupils from schools able to offer subsidised places.

Labour has pledged to phase out assisted places, which it says are divisive and elitist, and to use the money to cut class sizes. The scheme currently costs £107 million a year.

David Blunkett, the Shadow Education Secretary, accused Mrs Shephard of backtracking on the Prime Minister's pledge. "At this rate, the doubling of assisted places will take the best part of a decade to achieve. The simple fact is that all of the places have never been filled since the scheme began."

However, Mrs Shephard said in a parliamentary written answer that the pace of expansion would depend "on the supply of eligible high-quality places and on parental demand".

The extra £11 million to be spent on the scheme next year could fund about 3,000 more places, based on an average cost of £3,500 per year. Independent schools welcomed the move as a "bold initiative". David Smith, headmaster of Bradford Grammar School and chairman of the Independent Schools Joint Council's Assisted Places Committee, said: "The Government has moved with commendable speed to expand the scheme and it can expect a positive response."

The Independent Schools Information Service says demand for assisted places far exceeds supply, and expects schools to be keen to take up the extra places the Government is funding. As well as increasing the 293 schools presently in the scheme, ministers plan to offer places in smaller sixth forms. At present, they have to contain at least 60 pupils.

Mrs Shephard also hinted that the means test for parents may be relaxed. She said that she would "consider any representations on these matters".

Officials play down meningitis outbreaks

By Edward Gorman

THE Public Health Laboratory attempted yesterday to reassure parents that there is not a nationwide epidemic of meningitis, after a new case was reported at a school in west London involving a 16-year-old girl.

The girl, from the Godolphin and Latymer School in Hammersmith, was admitted to St Thomas's Hospital at the weekend. The case follows the deaths of five people in a "cluster" outbreak of the disease in Lincoln and the death on Monday of a university student in Leeds.

Staff at Godolphin and Latymer, an independent girls' school with 700 pupils between 11 and 18, said there had been no panic among the girls or parents. The girl is out of danger and likely to be home by Christmas.

Margaret Rudland, the Head Mistress, has written to all parents, enclosing a letter from a consultant in communicable disease control at Hammersmith and Ealing Health Authority, advising them to be on the alert for early symptoms.

Officials at the Public Health Laboratory at Colindale, north London, said instances of the disease reported in recent weeks were not above the seasonal norm. "We get an increase every winter," a spokeswoman said. "The clustering is also a phenomenon you see with meningococcal disease and a pattern we have seen in previous winters."

Journalist says MP was eyeing men in gay pub

By Michael Horsnell

THE Conservative MP David Ashby was spotted by a journalist looking at young men in a well-known London gay haunt, the High Court was told yesterday. After discovering that Andrew Pierce of The Times would be appearing as a witness against him in a libel case, the MP for Leicestershire North West approached the reporter and called him a liar, the court was told.

Mr Ashby is suing The Sunday Times for libel over an allegation that he is homosexual. Mr Ashby, 55, denied being in the Queen's Head in Tryon Street, Chelsea, on the night of December 14, 1991.

Richard Hartley, QC, counsel for The Sunday Times, said Mr Pierce, who had worked at the House of Commons for nearly two years, would say in evidence that the MP was in one of London's "oldest and best known gay pubs" between 8.30 and 9.30 that night. Men could be seen holding hands and the bar staff were obviously gay, he said.

Mr Hartley asked Mr Ashby: "You were casually dressed in a dark anorak-type jacket without a hood. You had a pint in your hand and you were wandering around looking at younger men. Is any of that true?"

Mr Ashby said that at the time he was in his constituency though he accepted he had twice visited the pub, once with his wife and married friends, and once on a hot day when he sat outside. "Whether it's a gay pub, I don't know, but your solicitors have shown me a homosexual guide to London — I didn't know such things existed — which shows it's a homosexual pub, and I think I must accept that," Mr Ashby said.

He said he had met Mr Pierce four weeks ago at a reception to mark publication of Great Parliamentary Scandals by Matthew Parris of The Times, a former MP, "in which, I regret, I feature".

Mr Ashby added: "I accepted an invitation to the reception and I there met Mr Andrew Pierce whom I discovered on opening the book was an assistant editor of the book. I went up to him and said, 'You are the person who is going to lie about me'."

He told the jury that he regretted having said such a thing because it was nasty and because, as a criminal barrister, he realised how "fragile" identification evidence can be. He went up to Mr Pierce again, apologised and suggested that they should have a drink or dinner together when the case was over.

The MP is suing The Sunday Times and its former Editor Andrew Neil over an article in January 1994 alleging that he had spent a holiday in Goa with a male friend. The newspaper accepts the report was untrue but maintains Mr Ashby is a homosexual who had an affair with a man and is lying in denying it.

The case continues.

Baron, the police horse, recovering with Jo Alcraft at the Blue Cross animal centre at Burford, Oxfordshire

Horse saved from animal sanctuary

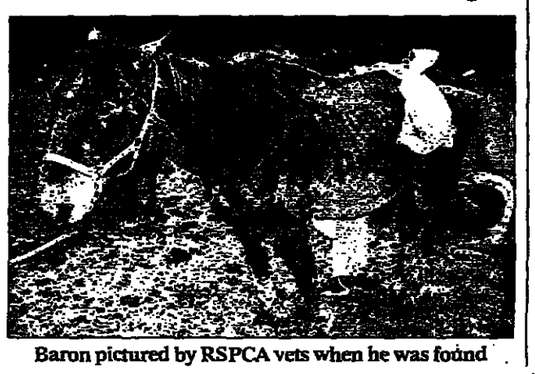

A METROPOLITAN police horse that regularly paraded at the Changing of the Guard has recovered after enduring weeks of neglect at an animal sanctuary where it was sent into retirement (Richard Duce writes).

After 18 years' service Baron, a 16-hand Irish Hunter, was put out to grass with the Joanne Long Memorial Trust animal charity.

The animal, which paraded on the Prince and Princess of Wales's wedding day, was rescued in a stricken condition from a remote Welsh hillside by the RSPCA. It has now been nursed back after horrified officers discovered its fate over several weeks at the hands of Steve Corsini, a trustee of the animal charity.

Baron was found up to his fetlocks in mud and his coat covered in sores and lice.

Last month Corsini was convicted on 28 charges of causing unnecessary suffering to animals. He was sentenced to 240 hours' community service, ordered to pay £1,000 and banned from keeping horses, ponies and cattle for ten years by Carmarthen magistrates.

Inquiry call into petrol price war

More than 6,000 petrol stations could be forced out of business over the next two years because they are in the crossfire of a price war between Esso and supermarket chains, the Government was told yesterday. The Petrol Retailers' Association, which represents independent filling stations, is demanding a Monopolies and Mergers Commission inquiry. It says the closure of so many petrol stations would result in 50,000 lost jobs. The main target for the retailers' complaint is Esso's "PriceWatch" campaign which has led to price cuts of up to 10p a litre.

Calais escape

Two British ferries trapped by a dock strike escaped from Calais last night. The crew of the Stena Invicta cut their own mooring ropes, while P&O's Pride of Bruges called in local police to force workers to handle the ship and to allow it to sail. Dockers are defying an injunction.

A strike by thousands of jobcentre staff will go ahead today after talks aimed at settling a pay dispute broke down yesterday. The Civil and Public Services Association said jobcentres across the country would close for the day because of the walkout which will also hit unemployment benefit offices.

Liar sentenced

A sex attacker who was found to have lied to a judge that he was a Falklands veteran had his prison sentence increased from 27 months to three years at Cardiff Crown Court yesterday. Former Welsh Guardsman Phillip Edwards, 36, of Rhondda, claimed he was a survivor of the attack on the landing ship Sir Galahad.

British campaign improves safety on ferries

BY JONATHAN PRYNN
TRANSPORT CORRESPONDENT

ALL Channel ferry operators are to be forced to improve the stability of their ships after the French government dropped opposition to British-backed proposals for a new safety standard.

Representatives of seven West European nations, including Italy, Spain and the Scandinavian countries as well as Britain and France, will meet in Sweden next week to agree the terms. They will require roll-on, roll-off ferries to be able to stay afloat in rough seas even with up to 50cm (20in) of sea water on the car deck.

Existing standards make no reference to water on the car deck, which caused the Herald of Free Enterprise to capsize within minutes off Zeebrugge, and the Estonia to sink in the Baltic, with the loss of more than 1,000 lives.

The move, requiring structural changes such as car-deck bulkheads, follows the failure of the UN's International Maritime Organisation to set a global standard on water on the car deck at its conference in London, which ended yesterday. The standard set by the breakaway group of seven nations is expected to apply to all 70 of the roll-on, roll-off ferries which are operating at British ports.

Agreement would represents a victory for the British Government. The French had said that British-backed proposals had "no technical foundation" and would create a precedent that would seriously hamper world trade.

A compromise was reached after days of tough negotiation. It averts the threat of French ships being banned from British ports for not reaching the required safety levels.

The new rules will probably be introduced over the next four years at a cost of up to £350 million. The main British operators have always insisted they would comply with whatever safety standards were set, but they were deeply suspicious of any standards that would not also apply to French ships.

The expected new rule is aimed at giving passengers enough time to evacuate a ship which is holed below the water line and has water on its car deck. Naval experts are worried that the ships would be unstable.

In their evidence to the Commons Transport Select Committee on ferry safety last year, the Institute of Naval Architects said that three out of four ferries would "sink like a stone" if water got on their car decks.

Feuding grandfathers return to court in case of the ever-growing cypress

Neighbours refuse to bury hatchet in hedge dispute

BY DOMINIC KENNEDY

TWO grandfathers whose war over a fast-growing hedge has become one of Britain's longest neighbourhood disputes returned to court yesterday as unswerving as ever.

The majesty of the law, in the shape of Mr Recorder Wolton, QC, two barristers, two solicitors, a clerk, usher and arboriculturists hired by each side, gathered in Birmingham County Court for two days of legal argument over the pruning without permission of a 25ft cypress hedgerow.

Of the parties to the dispute only the hedge was missing, but portraits of the monster as it continued its upwardly mobile progress were described by the judge as very helpful. The four-year legal battle, which is likely to cost £65,000, follows the lopping of 9ft from the top of the cypress by Michael Jones, 67, a retired teacher, after it reached 25ft. His neighbour Bernard Stanton, 87, a retired civil engineer, is seeking £30,000 damages for trespass and damage to the hedge.

The saga began in 1971 when Mr Jones and his wife moved into a new house built on the Bournville Village Trust estate in Selly Oak, Birmingham, the site of the model 19th-century community created by George Cadbury for his workers. Before the new house was built, Mr Stanton, who had lived there since 1947, had a view of a field of ponies and an open-air communal swimming pool, now filled in.

Mr Stanton planted ten tiny, innocent-looking shrubs on the border where his garden backs on to his neighbour's, selecting Cupressus leylandii, the fastest-growing breed of conifer, which can reach 100ft in about 30 years.

Bernard Stanton on his way to court yesterday

The Joneses, who are keen gardeners, admired the hedge at first, watering it through the drought of 1975 and treating it to Mr Jones's special recipe compost.

But when the hedge reached 25ft, the portly Mr Jones — in a series of arthritic dawn raids — began trimming the cypress to relieve the gloomy shadow cast over his own cherished garden display of fuchsias, lobelias and dwarf conifers. Mr Stanton took out an injunction and claimed damages in 1991. Two years later a court ruled that Mr Jones had the right to maintain, replace and repair the hedge.

At a Court of Appeal hearing last year Lady Justice Butler-Sloss upheld that decision, saying: "These two elderly gentlemen should really bring their unhappy dispute to an end as soon as possible." The case was sent back to Birmingham, where battle resumed yesterday.

Much of the day was spent in cross-examining Roy Finch, the arboriculturist hired by Mr Stanton. The unfortunate Mr Finch predicted in 1989 that the hedge would soon fall prey to disease and die because of the way it had been cut by Mr Jones.

Because of the length of the litigation, he has returned to the witness stand in time to see his prediction prove spectacularly inaccurate. On his way to court yesterday, Mr Finch visited Selly Oak and stood in the middle of the hedge to discover it had continued its vigorous growth to more than 22ft, almost as high as when Mr Jones first reached for his pruning shears.

Philip Kremen, barrister for Mr Jones, pulled apart Mr Finch's expert evidence as confidently as if he was plucking leaves from a twig. "You have been surprised if not astonished at the resilience and growth of these trees since you last saw them," he told Mr Finch, who conceded that he was.

Mr Kremen: "Your forecasts at every stage of this case have proved to be wrong, haven't they?" Mr Finch: "On the growth of the trees, yes."

On their resilience, Mr Finch conceded he had been wrong. On their susceptibility to disease, he agreed he had been wrong so far.

To prove how carefully his client would have cut the trees, Mr Kremen played his trump card: "Did you know that Mr Jones has won the garden competition of the Bournville Trust in 1993 and 1995?"

Mr Finch replied: "I have had no contact with Mr Jones — no I wasn't aware of that."

DAVID JONES

Maureen and Michael Jones are dwarfed by the hedge behind their garden

Mr Stanton, magnificently unbending and unsmiling at the back of the court, made a strange hissing sigh.

Mr Jones, who is writing a book entitled Defence of the Boundary to replace the life savings he has spent fighting the case (an arboriculturist cost him up to £33 an hour in the early stages) sat two places from Mr Stanton's son Paul, 55, who was convicted of hitting him four years ago.

The case continues.

Falconer guilty of keeping two eagles

A FALCONER was convicted yesterday of illegally possessing two rare golden eagles. Keith Sweetman was given a conditional discharge by magistrates who decided against fining him after being told that would bring an automatic ban from keeping protected birds for five years. He was ordered to pay £500 court costs.

Sweetman, of Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire, was convicted under the 1981 Wildlife and Countryside Act of possessing the two female golden eagles on September 16 last year.

Magistrates at Aylesbury were told that the two birds were found in aviaries at Sweetman's former home by police after a tip-off from Department of Environment officials. Sweetman, 52, who denied the charge, claimed the seven-week-old chicks had been left on the doorstep by a stranger and he had tried to get them registered with the department.

After the case he said: "I am disappointed but relieved at the low penalty and the fact I am not banned from keeping birds. I wouldn't advise anyone to take in birds, no matter who they are, because of what happened to me."

Sweetman, a falconer for 34 years and founder of the Federation for the Protection of Falconers, told the court that he notified the department of the find within a week so the birds could be returned. He had received no reply. He claimed that he was being victimised, and the department wanted to get him banned. But Peter Tooke, for the prosecution, said the birds were offspring of two different mothers and could not have been chance finds.

Robin Dupreez, for the defence, said his client's only wrongdoing had been that he had not contacted the department quickly enough.

Choirboy asks court for classic ruling

A CHOIRBOY is taking the compilers of the classical album charts to court over their refusal to admit his debut solo album on the ground that choirboy music is not "automatically classical".

Anthony Way, 12, and his record company Permanent Records are seeking judicial review of the decision in the High Court. This will be the first time that Chart Information Network, which compiles the charts, has been challenged in the courts.

Anthony, a pupil at St Paul's Cathedral Choir School in London, said yesterday he was upset and shocked by the decision to exclude The Choirboy from the classical charts. "I am classically trained and I have a treble voice, which you can't use for anything except classical music," he said. "If my record is not classical, then what is it? It's hardly rock music."

The album is Anthony's second. The first, featuring him singing the soundtrack to the television series The Choir, reached the top of the classical charts earlier this year and was also a hit in the pop charts.

John Lennard of Permanent Records said it was absurd that the new album, which has already sold 28,000 copies in a week, has been excluded. He said the album includes a higher percentage of classical works than the first. "This decision has caused tremendous confusion as the retailers are putting The Choirboy in the classical sections but it is not in the classical chart."

Way: shocked that his record was excluded

Boy of 3 died in jet ski accident

A FATHER told an inquest yesterday that his three-year-old son died in a flooded gravel pit after being thrown from a jet ski they were both riding.

Aarome Bessasa-Grant spent up to seven minutes in the water after the jet ski ran out of control. Kevon Jobson, his father, tried to resuscitate him, but he died later in hospital, the inquest in Oxford was told.

Mr Jobson had not been wearing a lifejacket and was trespassing with friends at Drayton Lake in Berinsfield, Oxfordshire. He said he had taken the jet ski for a test ride before going out again with Aarome, who was known as Charlie, wedged between his legs. He planned to ride slowly to protect the boy.

"I rode too slowly into a corner, causing the jet ski to capsize with me and my son," Mr Jobson, of Oxford, said. "I did not realise that when the jet ski was running slow it did not have the necessary momentum. When it capsized me and Charlie surfaced apart from one another. I was treading water and was fully clothed. I was chatting to my son, telling him to hold on and it would be OK. I then found myself being sucked by the current which pulled me out.

"I made a panic swim to the jet ski, which was still afloat. Charlie was afloat on his back with his head tilted up. He was punching his hands and kicking his legs. The current was taking him further and further away.

"I tried to explain to him to just hold on and not try and fight the current. I said, 'Come on Charlie, I'm going to get you.' But it was too far to get to him; I am not a champion swimmer."

Mr Jobson then unsuccesfully tried to right the jet ski. "Everyone was shouting at me to do this and do that, but it became impossible. I tried again and was thrown back into the water. By this time I could see my son drifting away on the current. I put my hand up and shouted for help."

Kevin Thornton, a witness, swam out to the jet ski and brought the boy ashore. Mr Jobson, who had first-aid training, gave him mouth-to-mouth resuscitation. "He was breathing OK. He had brought some food up and then started to burp, which indicated water had got into him. I put him in the recovery position." However, the boy died as a result of lack of oxygen to his brain.

Nicholas Gardiner, the coroner, recorded a verdict of accidental death. He said: "Water is an unforgiving creature and I think people who have learnt to swim in warm waters and swimming pools do not appreciate the effects of swimming in rivers and gravel pits. Proper buoyancy aids are necessary and it is not something on which one should scrimp. They are not cheap items but are well worthwhile. This is a sad story that indicates that lifejackets should not only be worn by children but by all adults, no matter how competent or physically fit."

Schoolboys suspected over find that fooled museum experts for 80 years

Prized Stone Age carving exposed as juvenile hoax

BY NIGEL HAWKES, SCIENCE EDITOR

AN ENGRAVED bone believed to date from the Stone Age and one of only two of its type in Britain has been shown to be a fake.

The bone is in fact a medieval rib, probably from a horse, and dates from somewhere between the end of the 13th and the beginning of the 15th century. The engraving on it, of the head and forequarters of a horse, was probably carried out by a forger after the bone was dug up in Dorset earlier this century.

Suspicion seems likely to centre on two boys from Sherborne School who found the bone in a quarry in 1911, or perhaps on their science teacher. But the real victim was Arthur Smith Woodward, Keeper of Geology at the Natural History Museum, to whom it was sent.

He was duped not once, but twice. He championed the Piltdown skull, now regarded as the scientific fake of the century. Those skull fragments "discovered" in 1913 were thought to be remains of the earliest human in Europe until proved to be a hoax in 1953. The jaw was from an orang-utan. Woodward also wrote the first description of the Sherborne bone, backing its claim to be an example of palaeolithic art.

Despite Woodward's support, the bone has always had its detractors. As early as 1924 Professor William Sollas, an Oxford archaeologist, declared it a fake perpetrated by the boys, Arnaldo Cortesi and Philip Grove.

But Sollas's accusation was answered by Elliot Steel, the *boys' science master, and oth*er experts have since supported Steel's view that the bone was genuine.

Now Woodward's successors at the museum have used modern methods of analysis to prove it a forgery. Dr Chris Stringer of the Department of Palaeontology at the museum, with colleagues including Dr Francesco d'Errico of the Institut du Quaternaire in Talence, France, report in Nature that the bone cannot be what it is purported to be.

Radiocarbon dating carried out in Oxford shows that the bone is 610 years old, plus or minus 45 years. If it had been a Stone Age artefact it would have been more than ten times older.

Analysis of the engraving, at which Dr d'Errico is an expert, shows that the lines are free of the sediment that otherwise covers the bone. This means that the cuts were made after the bone had lain for many years in the soil. Furthermore, the lines are not like those made by stone tools on fresh bone, but have flaking at the edges, showing that the lines were scratched on an already weathered bone.

Exactly when the forgery was carried out cannot be determined, though Dr Stringer suspects it was soon after the bone had been found, and just before it was given to Woodward.

"Whether the schoolboys did it we don't know," Dr Stringer says. "But drawings had been published of a Stone Age engraving which they might have traced or copied."

The bone was found in quarry workings near Sherborne with fragments of stone and fossils and believed to be debris from a cave occupied by Stone Age man. Woodward considered it genuine and published his description in April 1914.

"Was it a joke or did it have a serious intent?" Dr Stringer asks. "We don't know."

But the museum will no be throwing it out. "We shall keep it as a curiosity and as a warning to others," he says.

Woodward: twice wrong

Lump removal 'proves equal of mastectomy'

BY NIGEL HAWKES, SCIENCE EDITOR

WOMEN whose breast cancer is found when it is still small do not need to have the entire breast removed, two studies have confirmed. They show that "lumpectomy" — removing just the lump in the breast — followed by radiotherapy is as effective as total breast removal. However, the results leave a question mark over whether radiotherapy has any overall benefit.

An international team organised by scientists at the Clinical Trial Service Unit at the Radcliffe Infirmary, Oxford, reviewed and combined data from 36 trials. In a second report, an American study of 2,000 women reaches the same conclusions, the New England Journal of Medicine reports.

There was no significant difference in survival between women who had lumpectomy plus radiotherapy and those who had mastectomy. In both groups 70 per cent were still alive ten years after surgery.

Professor Richard Peto, of the Imperial Cancer Research Fund's Oxford Unit, said: "If the cancer is small enough for lumpectomy to be practicable, and if the lumpectomy is followed by radiotherapy, then only about one woman in ten will need more surgery."

The American results, from a long-running project, have been overshadowed by the discovery last year that false data was submitted for six women treated at the St Luc Hospital in Montreal. A re-examination of the data to exclude these cases now shows it makes no difference: lumpectomy is still as safe as mastectomy.

The only doubt arises over the use of radiotherapy. The results considered by the Oxford study show that it does reduce the risk of the tumour reappearing, but does not significantly improve survival chances. This is because radiation treatment slightly increases the risk of death from other causes, especially in women over 60.

☐ Work is to start in January on the lung cancer research centre for which the entertainer Roy Castle campaigned tirelessly as he was dying from the disease.

Mr Castle, who died aged 62 in September last year, devoted his last few months to fundraising for his "Cause for Hope" appeal, making a tour of 12 cities.

Work will start on the £3.8 million Roy Castle International Centre for Lung Cancer Research in Liverpool on January 10. The centre will be the world's first international centre dedicated to the illness.

The foundation has raised £7.2 million since July 1994. The remainder will go towards staffing and running costs, and a second appeal will be launched to pay for the second phase of building work. The first phase is due to be completed in July 1997.

Scientists claim first sight of mind's eye

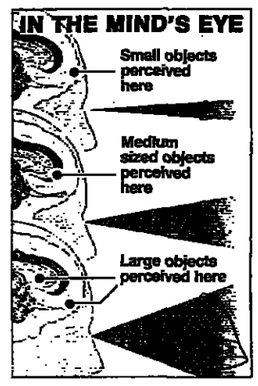

BY OUR SCIENCE EDITOR

AMERICAN scientists have located the "mind's eye", the parts of the brain where mental images are generated.

A team from Harvard University and Massachusetts General Hospital tested their theory by asking male volunteers to close their eyes and visualise objects while the blood flow in the brain was measured. They were shown pictures with their eyes open, then asked to imagine them at different sizes with their eyes closed. Areas of the brain they were using were identified by the increased blood flow through them.

The results, published in Nature, showed that in right-handed volunteers most of the images were generated in the right side of the cortex, the outer layer of the brain. Images of different sizes were generated in different areas, implying that the images are primarily pictorial. In addition, all the images lie close to the eye, before the brain has had time to attach language-based labels to the images.

The work does not prove that these are the areas where visual images are stored, merely where they are generated. This, the team says, implies that knowledge can fundamentally bias what one sees, or that one is likely to see what one expects to see.

Nerve tests give clue to spinal care

BY NIGEL HAWKES

THE prospect of repairing catastrophic spinal injuries like the one that crippled the Superman actor Christopher Reeve has moved a step closer.

A scientific team at Georgetown University Medical Centre in Washington DC has persuaded the nerves in the spinal cord of rats to grow back after injury. Though still a long way from clinical application, the results are "a genuine step forward", says Dr Clifford Woolf of University College London, in a commentary in Nature.

One reason why nerves do not repair themselves is that myelin, the material surrounding them, produces growth-inhibiting substances. The team from Georgetown injected injured rats with an antibody designed to neutralise the growth inhibitors. Those rats recovered the ability to do things that untreated animals could not.

European mink near extinction

BY NICK NUTTALL

THE European mink has joined the list of animals on the verge of extinction, British scientists report.

The animal, which has a distinctive white nose that looks as though it has been dipped in powder, was once common across the former Soviet Union and Europe as far west as France. However, scientists from Oxford University and researchers in Estonia, Belorussia and Russia have found that the animal, Mustela lutreola, is now extinct in the wild except for a small population in north eastern Belorussia.

The scientists believe the animal's decline is probably the result of the introduction across Europe of the more aggressive American mink, Mustela vison, for fur farming in 1926, and the loss of its habitat.

Dr David McDonald, a zoologist at Oxford co-ordinating the project, said yesterday that the relic population in Belorussia was also heading for extinction. The researchers are now starting a captive breeding programme of the European species at Tallinn zoo in Estonia to reintroduce the creature to the wild.

Inquiry ordered into 'party within a party'

BY IAN MURRAY, COMMUNITY CORRESPONDENT

THE left-wing leader of Walsall council was suspended from the Labour Party yesterday and will be forced to relinquish control of the authority.

Dave Church and his deputy, John Rothery, are among five people suspended by the National Executive Committee, which has now ordered an inquiry into the Walsall Socialist Group. The five are members of the group, which has been likened to Militant and described in a Labour report as a party within a party.

Labour's action follows heavy criticism of the council leadership over its plans to sell Walsall civic centre and set up 55 district "mini-town halls". The NEC voted 23 to 2 in favour of the suspensions after a recommendation in a report from John Prescott, Clare Short and Nigel Harris of the AEEU engineering union.

The three NEC members all have left-wing sympathies but felt there was no point in trying to deal with Mr Church, even though he had agreed to wider consultations about his town hall plans. Ms Short said: "When we went to Walsall we believed that we could conciliate, but the people with whom we were negotiating broke their word. We have now evidence of a tight and disciplined group within the party and we have to act."

Last night Mr Church said: "I am disgusted that they have come along with totally misleading, inaccurate accusations. They laughingly offered something called conciliation and when we satisfied the panel they just came back with the favourite old catch-all for a witch hunt — a party within a party.

"We were found guilty when Mawhinney attacked us in August and they have been looking round ever since for a charge to find us guilty of. All we did was follow the manifesto we were elected to implement.

"I am now going to do a lot of thinking. But one thing is certain — I am not going to go away."

The suspended five include one other councillor, Brian Powell, chairman of Walsall Labour Party. None of the five can continue to hold office in the party. They will keep their seats on the council but will not be eligible to hold any official posts.

Keith Rochelle and Steve Baggott, the other two suspended by the NEC, are key members of the Walsall Socialist Group. Labour rules ban the operation of independent groups within the party.

According to national Labour Party sources, group membership is by invitation. Those asked to join are supposed to pay 1 per cent of their salary towards its funding.

Meetings are said to be in secret with decisions binding on all members at all levels. The party says that the group is a Walsall phenomenon operating a bit like Militant, unaffiliated to anything.

But Mr Church said: "It is total rubbish to say it exists as a secret society, dictating policy. We meet to discuss issues, that's all, and there is no levy on membership."

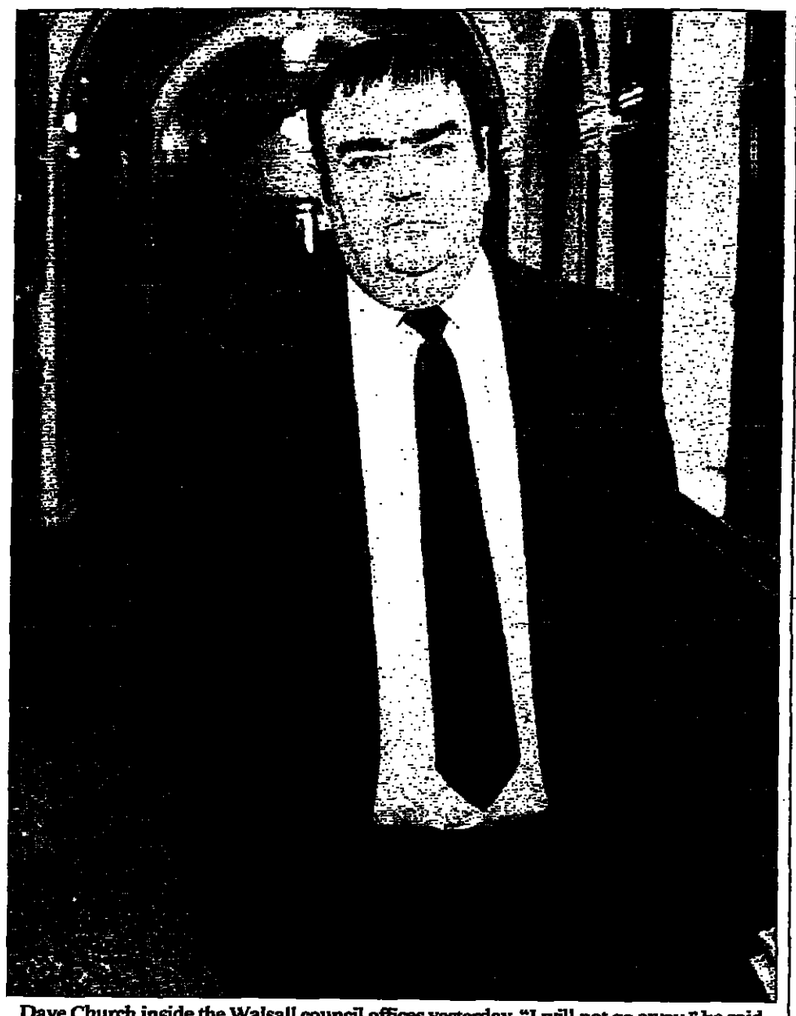

Mr Rothery said: "This talk of a tight, disciplined group is not true. It does not have any premises, there is no constitution, there are no rules, there is nothing." The group met occasionally to discuss issues such as the Maastricht treaty, the NHS and Bosnia. It was affiliated to the Socialist Campaign Group, connected to the Campaign Group of MPs.

"Without us having any opportunity to answer the allegations, they have taken action. This started in the summer when the Walsall Labour Party was suspended for alleged bullying and intimidation. This has been dropped now because there is no truth in it. Now we are hearing allegations about a party within a party. All I can conclude is that there has been a decision nationally that can perhaps win a few votes in the South East to be seen to be strong against us."

Fifteen of the 34 Labour councillors belong to the group and there are 15 moderates. The three suspensions mean that the moderates will have a majority when the remaining Labour members chose a new leader.

The new leadership must decide what to do about the decentralisation plan, which has yet to go beyond the appointment of five new chief officers as members of a "corporate board" to run Walsall.

☐ Stewart Foster, Labour leader of Leicester City Council, resigned yesterday when he lost a vote of confidence after an internal report confirmed that he had been having an affair with Kathy Kerswell-Reid, head of the council's policy unit. The report said that Ms Kerswell-Reid had been sent on a sabbatical course because the affair "presented a risk of maladministration".

Lilley hoping to save £600m with fraud crackdown

BY JILL SHERMAN, POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

PETER LILLEY announced a crackdown on housing benefit fraud yesterday among measures designed to save an extra £600 million next year.

The Social Security Secretary said that total fraud savings would rise to £1.5 billion next year and £2.5 billion by 1998-99.

Mr Lilley disclosed that a further £134 million would be invested in sophisticated computer schemes and other methods to spot false claims for benefits. These include increasing the number of home visits to verify claimants' details and introducing a computerised benefit smartcard due to be launched next year.

But he made clear that he would focus next year's campaign against fraud on the £10.5 billion housing benefit bill. Making his uprating statement in the Commons yesterday, he suggested that £1 billion was lost in housing benefit fraud every year. A national computer record of housing benefit claimants will be introduced next year to stop people claiming from more than one authority.

Local councils will be eligible for incentive payments if they exceed given thresholds for combating fraud. But local councils that fail to achieve "reasonable levels" of performance in preventing fraud will risk financial penalties.

From October next year, local authorities will be able to make the first Giro cheque for housing benefit payable to landlords, to stop tenants absconding without making initial payments. In addition Mr Lilley has decided to have housing benefit paid in arrears to stop the "wrongful" payments sometimes made as a result of paying in advance.

He gave further details of Budget measures to cut housing benefit for young people. From next October housing benefit for the 208,000 people under 25 living in rented accommodation will be limited to the average local rent for shared accommodation rather than self-contained accommodation.

Social security figures suggest that some youngsters could lose out by £33 per week under the changes. The figures will apply retrospectively, so that anyone moving home after January 1st, next year will be affected.

"Housing benefit should not provide an incentive for young people to leave the parental home unnecessarily or to take on high priced accommodation at the taxpayer's expense. Nor is it right to lock young people into benefit dependency. The higher the rent paid by benefit the greater the disincentive to work."

Mr Lilley also confirmed that he would freeze benefits for lone parents and move towards phasing them out to ensure that single mothers were not given preferential treatment. He pointed out that lone parents now cost the taxpayer £9.4 billion a year, equivalent to over £1500 a year extra tax on every working family with children of their own. "The right aproach is neither to penalise nor to promote lone parenthood," he said.

"Today's measures continue my step by step reforms of social security. I have protected the most vulnerable and I am creating a fairer and more modern benefit system."

Arts groups outraged by Budget cuts

BY DALYA ALBERGE, ALEXANDRA FREAN AND JOHN GOODBODY

THE worlds of arts, heritage and sport reacted with dismay yesterday at the cuts in government spending. Small arts groups said that Budget cuts had left them on their knees.

In the past three years, 85 theatre companies have closed. One company after another criticised what they see as the Government's inability to appreciate that the nation's culture and sports need investment. However, Virginia Bottomley, the National Heritage Secretary, said that arts, sports and heritage organisations had to live in the "real world" and accept reductions in their budgets. She said it would be foolish to expect that the advent of National Lottery grants would exempt them from normal Treasury scrutiny.

Nicola Thorold, director of the Independent Theatre Council, which represents small and medium-sized companies, said she was outraged. "They promised in the election manifesto to maintain support for the arts; that's now dropped by £18 million in real terms. They promised when they brought in the lottery, that it wouldn't affect revenue funding; there's been a 5 per cut in real terms. The lottery is wonderful, but going into buildings and not artists."

Libby MacNamara, director of the Association of British Orchestras, said companies would inevitably close. She said Britain should feel ashamed of its public arts spending compared to other European countries.

Dr Alan Borg, director of the V&A Museum, whose budget has been cut by £1 million to £30.6 million, said it was ironic Mrs Bottomley had maintained her department's spending on tourism, while cutting museums spending. "What are museums, if not a major contribution to tourism?"

Dick Palmer, secretary of the British Olympic Association, said he was "greatly saddened" by the cut in the Sports Council's grant. "Our Olympic governing bodies are worse off now, than in the build-up to Barcelona four years ago. Our team going to Atlanta will be the smallest since Moscow in 1980."

Clarke has ensured that tax burden will continue to rise

The populist critics of the Budget have got it wrong. Kenneth Clarke did not err on the side of responsibility and caution. He had, and has, little freedom of manoeuvre. There was no realistic scope for a bigger tax "giveaway".

To use the meaningless distinction widely aired over the past two days, it was not an economic as opposed to a political Budget. The measures were certainly not reckless, or blatantly irresponsible, but the overall impression of caution is misleading. Mr Clarke took a number of risks which could make his Budget look less safe in a year's time.

The small reductions in mortgage interest rates announced yesterday were celebrated as a vindication of the Budget strategy, and so they are. But they are the minimum that could have been expected, especially in the light of the easing of interest rates worldwide. The striking feature is the tight constraints on Mr Clarke. He was able to announce only limited income tax cuts (really a tiny one-year dip in a rising overall tax burden) because of optimistic assumptions about economic growth, a bigger than usual reduction in the reserve for unforeseen spending items, an implausible further squeeze on Whitehall running costs and some creative accounting on capital programmes.

RIDDELL ON POLITICS

These calculations could go wrong in several ways, as they have over the last year: exports and growth could be less buoyant, tax revenue could again be lower than expected, public spending may not be as tightly controlled as it has been. So public borrowing could again be higher than forecast. If the current slowdown is more than a pause in growth, there is nothing wrong in temporarily higher borrowing. But that is no excuse for a loosening of fiscal policy, or for tax cuts not matched by lower spending plans. Mr Clarke has accepted these constraints. In his speech, he repeatedly highlighted the extra money for education, health and the police. As the leading One Nation Tory in the Cabinet, he endorses the current structure of the welfare state.

Admittedly, the gradual changes introduced by Peter Lilley have helped to slow the real growth of social security spending from 3 to 1 pwr cent a year. This is a big saving, but the much trumpeted reduction in the share of public spending in national income to less than 40 per cent in 1997-98 will only be after several years of a growing economy. As Professor Nicholas Bosanquet has warned, there is no guarantee that the share will not climb above 40 per cent again in the next recession. The main Tory achievement, and it is a considerable one, is to have reduced the peak recession share of spending below the levels of the mid-1970s and mid-1980s. This is not a dramatic rolling back of the size of the public sector to the scale of Japan or America.

The pertinent criticism of Mr Clarke from the Right is not that he has failed to tackle waste (he has done as much, and probably more, than is credible), but that he has not at least started to make long-term changes in the structure of the public sector. The Private Finance Initiative is largely irrelevant since it does not replace public by private finance in the long term but merely defers taxpayer funding of projects. Apart from pensions and student loans, the Government has been cautious about switching the costs of provision to the private sector.

That is where Mr Clarke's caution really matters and, over the long term, that is well after the next election, limits the scope for the type of deep cuts in tax which the Tory populists demand. Mr Clarke is right that there are no easy short-term cuts. But by failing to address the long-term issues he has ensured that the tax burden will remain high, and will continue to rise.

Forsyth announces scheme to debate Bills in Scotland

BY ARTHUR LEATHLEY, POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

JOHN MAJOR and fellow Cabinet ministers will take part in parliamentary debates in Scotland under changes unveiled by the Government yesterday.

Michael Forsyth, the Scottish Secretary, responded to the growing clamour for power to be devolved north of the border by announcing wider opportunities for Scottish MPs to debate legislation.

Mr Forsyth, taking steps to block opposition party pressure for devolution or independence, is to strengthen the powers of the Scottish Grand Committee, comprising all 72 Scottish MPs. He said that the moves would help to strengthen the Union which he described as a "growing and living relationship".

The committee, which meets in various Scottish and English locations, will take over responsibility from the Commons for debating uncontroversial Scottish Bills. It will also meet more regularly in Scotland and move to more venues there.

MPs will be allowed to set up special standing committees, calling for evidence from outside experts, to consider uncontroversial measures. The legislation would not be debated in the Commons, but Westminster would retain the final power to pass it.

Under changes aimed at making ministers more directly accountable to Scottish MPs, the Prime Minister and Kenneth Clarke, the Chancellor, will be the first Cabinet ministers to take part in debates in Scotland early in the new year. Previously, only Scottish Office ministers have been called to give evidence but Mr Forsyth said it was time other ministers started to "wake up" to issues concerning Scotland.

Mr Forsyth also made clear that 12 committee meetings will be arranged in Scotland to discuss government business, half selected by the Government, four by Labour and one each by the Scottish National Party and Liberal Democrats.

Ministers of all government departments will be expected to give evidence to the committee, although Scottish MPs will not be able to demand the presence of any particular minister. However, officials concede that public demands for the appearance of a particular minister would be difficult to resist.

Mr Forsyth said that Cabinet ministers often made decisions which impacted directly on the people of Scotland. "So it is only right that they too should have to explain to the Scottish Grand Committee in Scotland why particular policies are being followed and the benefits they will bring."

He said that important innovation added "a completely new dimension of accountability for Government business in Scotland, with the Prime Minister, Chancellor . . . and Deputy Prime Minister being able to present policies in a forum which will be accessible to the people of Scotland".

Mr Forsyth made the announcements on the eve of a St Andrew's Day speech today in which he will outline other changes to the powers of local government in Scotland. The speech will coincide with the unveiling of Labour's blueprint for a Scottish Constitutional Assembly.

George Robertson, the Shadow Scottish Secretary, ridiculed the proposals, claiming that the appearance of ministers amounted to no more than a "travelling circus" which would provide Cabinet ministers with the opportunity for "weekend breaks and away-day trips".

He dismissed Mr Forsyth's plans as "a con trick, nothing more, nothing less". He added: "His revamped Scottish Grand Committee will be little more than a rubber stamp for non-controversial legislation.

"This is a stark admission that the Government's policies towards Scotland have utterly failed. It's a confession that for the past 16 years the Tories have got it wrong on the government of Scotland."

Marriage can make all the difference

BY ANNE ASHWORTH

IF LIZ HURLEY and Hugh Grant, the nation's most celebrated cohabitees, with shared residences in Chelsea and Bath, were to forget that incident on Sunset Boulevard and marry, would they be better off?

The Chancellor certainly believes so. Charged with being a home wrecker by colleagues and churchmen, Kenneth Clarke mounted a spirited defence of his tax policy for married couples.

He declared in Tuesday's Budget speech: "It is a myth that the tax system penalises marriage. Any young couple contemplating living together and starting a family will pay less tax by getting married."

However, Mr Clarke then announced a paltry increase in the married couple's allowance. Frozen since 1991, it is being raised by £70 to £1,790. But a reduction in the rate of the tax to 15 per cent in a previous Budget mean that it is worth only £268.50, not enough to buy a train on one of those meringue-style dresses pilloried in Four Weddings and a Funeral.

Yesterday, however, accountants specialising in personal taxation pointed out that the Chancellor's words were just about accurate, if only because there are no special allowances for live-in lovers without offspring. Only if those who live together have children does the taxman look kindly on their situation. They can claim the additional personal allowance, given at the same level and rate of tax as the married couple's allowance.

Elspeth May, a partner at the accountancy firm KMPG, calculates that a couple who were both earning £50,000 but without children would pay, under the Budget tax changes, an extra £269 in tax if they chose to live together rather than tie the knot.

Matrimony also suits pensioners who are entitled to higher personal and married couple's allowances. A 75-year-old man with a £15,000 income and his 72-year-old wife, with interest of £5,000 from her savings, would pay together £1,765.15 in tax. Were they unmarried, this bill would rise by £473.25. Mrs May points out that married couples with substantial investments are also able to benefit where cohabitees are not. Were Miss Hurley and Mr Grant to name the day, clever tax planning would allow them to transfer assets from one to the other without fear of incurring capital gains tax at 40 per cent.

Marriage-friendly inheritance tax rules allow estates to pass tax-free to a spouse. If your significant other half leaves everything to you, tax will be payable on everything over £154,000, although the figure rises to £200,000 on April 6.

'Prisoner at No. 11' mocked by Brown

BY JAMES LANDALE
POLITICAL REPORTER

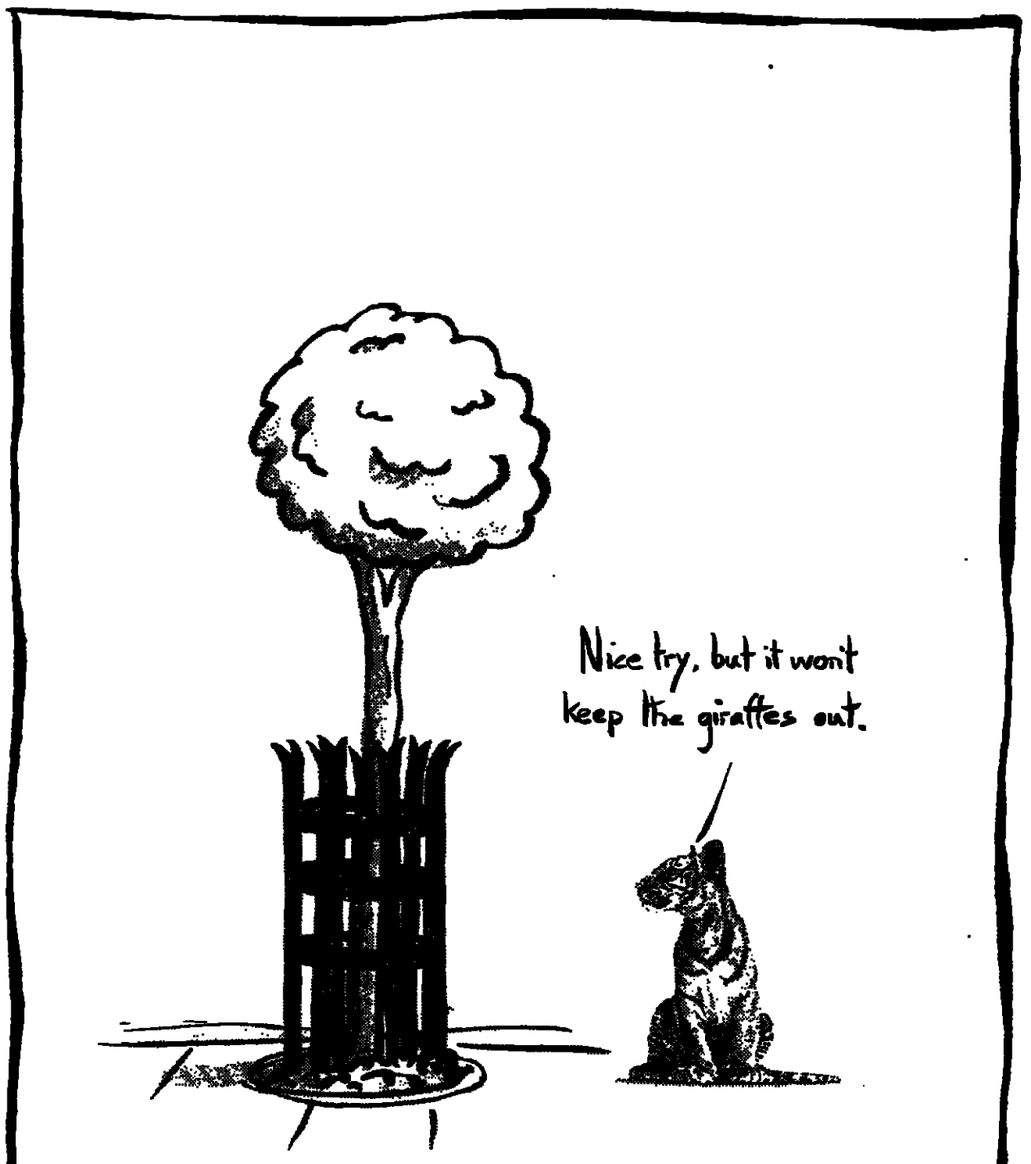

GORDON BROWN branded Kenneth Clarke yesterday as a Chancellor "imprisoned by his own economy" and unable to provide a Budget which the British people needed.

Opening the second-day debate, the Shadow Chancellor said the Conservatives had taken away pounds in recent tax rises but given back pennies. "There is no sign from his Budget that he has any sense of direction or strategy for the economy. He is a man without real choices, a prisoner of this Government's failure, paralysed by everything that has happened to the economy for the last 16 years."

Mr Brown said that despite the 1p cut in income tax, people were nearly £700 a year worse off after the 21 tax rises of recent years. "People will ask, 'All this suffering — what has it been for?' "

For the Government, William Waldegrave, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, said Mr Clarke had taken tough decisions to put public finances on a sound footing. "Sound public finances cannot mean ever-higher taxes to pay for ever-higher spending. That is the fundamental difference between this party and the party opposite."

He said the economy had experienced growth for the past four years. Exports, investment and living standards were up while unemployment was down. "And all this without inflation rising."

What reduces urban pollution, improves the city environment, enriches the air supply and provides lots of fun for small children? A tree does, of course. That's why we're trying to teach people who live in towns how beneficial trees can be, and how to treat them with respect, through our Esso Living Tree Campaign. Because if we treat our trees better, that's how they'll treat us.

Cost of keeping ageing 'chimpnauts' in the style befitting heroes estimated at $100 million

US Air Force plans to retire forgotten space race veterans

By Anjana Ahuja

THE United States Air Force is planning to retire the forgotten veterans of the American space programme. Its decision could earn the 150 ageing chimpanzees a retirement package worth up to $100 million (£64 million), ensuring their final years are spent in a manner befitting would-be space heroes.

According to a draft legislative proposal to be submitted to Congress next month, the air force wants to decommission the chimps but is unhappy about the astronomical cost of nursing its former charges through their twilight years. It favours packing them off to an outside organisation that could care for them. Also mooted in the proposal is that the apes could be used for other — undoubtedly less distinguished — research. "We want to transfer the chimps and the facilities to an outside agency, because we foresee no need for them," confirmed Major Chris Geisel, a spokesman at the press office in the Pentagon. "Unfortunately, because of the cost involved, no other agencies seem willing to take them."

He added that estimates for their upkeep could cost up to $7 million a year. According to the Coulston Foundation, which is caring for the chimps, the average lifespan of a chimpanzee in the wild is 35 years. As the youngest among the colony is several years old, the total cost of caring could be $100 million. The oldest air force chimp, Jeb, has reached the grand old age of 55 and is thought to be the oldest surviving chimpanzee in captivity.

The next oldest was 45-year-old Samson, who rubbed shoulders with Ham and Enos, the only American chimps in space. Samson died a fortnight ago.

Although the 150 chimps were on standby in case their services were required, none actually left Earth. They are, however, the offspring of the ones that did fly in space. Among the first ape astronauts were Able and Baker, two rhesus monkeys who flew aboard the Jupiter rocket in 1959. Ham was the first chimpanzee astronaut (nicknamed chimpnaut), and was launched into a sub-orbital mission aboard a Mercury capsule in January 1961. Ham (which stood for Holloman Aero Med, because the chimps were trained at the Holloman air force base in New Mexico) became a national hero, and is buried in the International Space Hall of Fame in New Mexico. The second and last chimpnaut was Enos, who made his journey in November 1961, eight years before men walked on the Moon.

The chimpanzees were chosen because of their similarity to humans. "Chimps have a similar genetic make-up to humans and can be trained to perform tasks," Major Geisel said.

After the success of the space programme, and confirmation that man could survive in space, the air force decided that the chimps were no longer immediately useful but should be kept on hand. It leased them from 1970 for medical research into hepatitis and HIV. They passed in 1993 into the care of the Coulston Foundation, which looks after them and about 400 other chimpanzees in a $10 million luxury home at the Holloman base. The foundation's lease will expire in 1999.

The air force approached zoos to take over the upkeep of the chimps but were turned down. "They were not thought to be suitable because they were not sociable enough," explained Major Geisel. "Although chimpanzees are an endangered species, we cannot just return them to the wild because they are a closed population. We have had offers from people wanting to adopt them, but that is not viable because chimps can be quite aggressive." Major Geisel added that animal welfare laws prevented the chimps from being destroyed.

The animals are kept in large rooms in family groups and are fed biscuits, fresh fruit and vegetables. "They love bananas," said Dr Frederick Coulston, director of the foundation, who has a portrait of Ham on his wall. "And they go absolutely wild about lettuce and carrots."

Dr Coulston and his staff of 155 at the air base would like to take over caring for the chimps permanently. "The chimps are like family to us, and they feel very happy and comfortable here," he said. "But the animals are the property of the air force and therefore the property of America. We have to wait to see what Congress and the Senate feel about that."

Reporter to visit Mir

Moscow: Russia and South Korea have been negotiating a plan to send a South Korean journalist on a space mission on board the Mir orbiting station, the Russian news agency Tass said yesterday.

The proposal came from South Korea's KBS broadcasting corporation earlier this year, Tass added, and the authorities are discussing the cost and timing of the flight which is tentatively scheduled to take place in the autumn of 1997 or early in 1998. (AP)

Dogs, ducks and rodents conquered the skies for mankind

Laika, the Soviet pioneer who was lost in space

By Giles Coren

WHILE chimpanzee veterans of the Nasa space programme have been lucky enough to escape the researcher's knife in retirement homes, their rodent friends, lower down the evolutionary chain, were not so lucky in a space shuttle mission two years ago.

On the flight of Columbia in October 1993, five of the 48 rats on board were decapitated without anaesthetic in what Nasa described as a procedure which promised "to give us the first opportunity to study the physical changes caused by microgravity". Apes, rats, frogs and dogs have died over the past 40 years for space science.

Today rehabilitation is the watchword. But the opinion of Laika, the Soviet dog which became the first canine in orbit in June 1956, will never be known. She was never recovered from space. Nor will the feelings of Hector the rat be any more traceable — he was the first French rodent in space, soaring 100 miles in 1961 and landing intact on Earth three minutes later. He died the following year of unrelated causes.

It was America which put the first ape in space, on December 14, 1958. Gordo, a 1lb squirrel monkey, was blasted 300 miles up in the nose cone of a Jupiter missile from Cape Canaveral. He travelled 1,700 miles and died over the South Atlantic.

On September 19, 1783, a dog, a duck and a cock took off in a Montgolfier balloon, the first animal aviators, from the gardens of Versailles in front of Louis XVI. Unlike the lucky primates, these three, no doubt, were consumed at the royal table with a glass of claret, in celebration of the dawn of flight.

The rate is variable and the APR is variable and typical. These terms apply only where a written offer of advance was issued on or after 16.10.95 and the mortgage completed by 31.3.1996. Typical example: based on an endowment interest rate of 4.99% 5.2% APR (this represents a discount of 3% off the standard variable mortgage rate) and a purchase price of £43,000, a couple taking out a mortgage of £40,000 over 25 years (from which a Mortgage Indemnity Arrangement Fee of £658.75 will be deducted and where the amount of the advance is 93% of the Society's valuation of the property) would pay interest of £166.34 per month gross (300 payments). Accrued interest £83.17. Valuer's fee £135.00. Solicitor's mortgage charges £100.00. Deeds Administration Fee payable on redemption £50.00 and a single repayment of capital of £40,000. Total amount payable £90,270 17. 7.99% 8.3% APR. The example assumes the mortgage starts in the middle of the month, a minimum guaranteed death benefit of £40,000 and a term of 25 years for the endowment policy. A first charge over your property will be required as security. For loans other than repayment loans, a suitable endowment policy, PEP or pension plan will also be required. A suitable level term assurance policy will also be required for PEP or pension plan mortgages. An indemnity policy, for which you will need to pay an arrangement fee, will be required where the mortgage exceeds the Society's normal maximum percentage advance of 75%. If the mortgage is either redeemed (in full or in part) or transferred to another scheme before the fourth anniversary of the date on which interest is first charged in respect of the mortgage, the value of the cashback you have received must be repaid in full and a redemption fee equal to the savings made as a result of the discount will be charged. The redemption fee will be subject to a maximum charge equivalent to 6 months' interest calculated at the rate payable at the time of repayment. The Cashback may affect personal liability to Capital Gains Tax. All mortgages are subject to status, valuation and a minimum age of 18. Clinton praises British 'risks for peace' in Bosnia

BY MARTIN FLETCHER AND MICHAEL EVANS, DEFENCE CORRESPONDENT

PRESIDENT CLINTON lavished praise on Britain's efforts in Bosnia during his visit to London yesterday as he continued to wage his campaign to persuade a hostile Congress to approve the deployment of 20,000 American troops to help to enforce the fragile new Balkan peace agreement.

Britain had taken "extraordinary risks for peace". Mr Clinton declared at a joint news conference with John Major on the steps of No 10. But he made no mention of past differences over Bosnia.

"The US deeply appreciates all this country has done to end the suffering in Bosnia — your brave soldiers who risked their lives as part of Unprofor, your countless humanitarian relief efforts to aid the people of that war-torn land, your diplomatic and military strength as members of the Contact Group and Nato."

Later, in an address to both Houses of Parliament broadcast live on American breakfast television, the President said Britain had already sacrificed much to help to bring peace to Bosnia and promised that America would "live up to its history and its ideals as well". If America failed to join the Nato force, "our leadership will be questioned and our partnerships will be weakened — partnerships we must have if we are to help each other in the fight against the common threats we face," he said.

The President told Mr Major during their talks that he was confident that he would ultimately prevail in persuading Congress to agree to deploy US troops in the Balkans. Britain is to be the second biggest contributor to the 60,000-strong Nato force, providing 13,000 troops. Without American participation, however, the operation will never take place.

But Mr Clinton appears determined to deploy troops, come what may. Without congressional approval, however, he would be taking an enormous political risk in the run-up to next year's presidential election.

Nato's historic peace enforcement operation in Bosnia-Herzegovina will begin early next week with the expected arrival of the first troops, including 350 from Britain, to start preparing for the arrival of the main force. Nato defence ministers, meeting at alliance headquarters in Brussels, agreed that an "enabling force" of 2,600 specialist troops should begin work immediately and that the bulk of the force must be in Bosnia within 30 days.

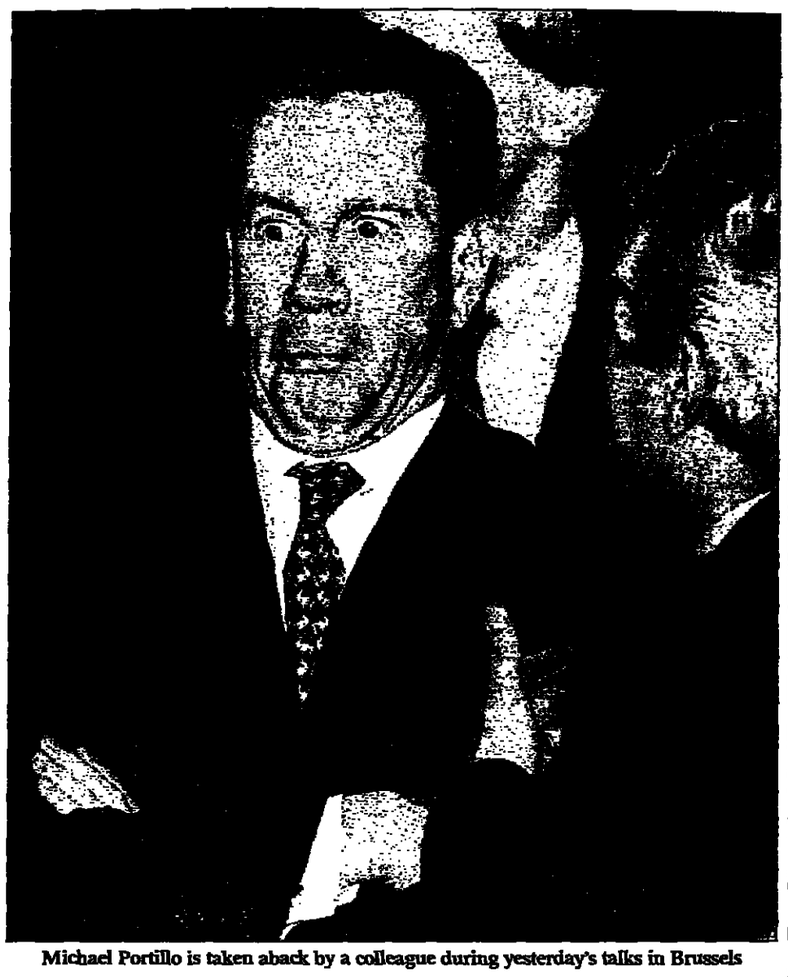

The need for a rapid deployment of troops was urged on the defence ministers by General George Joulwan, the American Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, who will be in overall charge of Operation Joint Endeavour, the mission's codename.

He said that thousands of Nato troops would have to be in place within 30 days because that was the period in which the warring parties were supposed to withdraw outside designated demilitarised zones under the peace agreement initialled at Dayton air base in Ohio last week.

The defence ministers also agreed that the Nato peace operation would last exactly a year. A British official said: "We agreed that we would all go in together, all work together and all leave together after 12 months."

In addition, the ministers backed a German proposal to start planning next year to increase the membership of the alliance. Although membership is not expected to be offered to countries from Central and Eastern Europe until at least 1998, Volker Rühe, the German Defence Minister, suggested Nato should begin to lay the groundwork.

Michael Portillo, the Defence Secretary, pointed out that Russian involvement with Nato in the Bosnian peace implementation force would do more to improve understanding between Nato and Moscow, which has serious reservations about the eastward expansion of the alliance, than would a decade of discussions.

Eurocorps is ready to go

Bonn: In a barracks outside Rheims in France, Eurocorps, Europe's fledgeling army, will declare itself ready for action today (Roger Boyes writes). However, its German commander, General Helmut Willmann, is careful not to call it the nucleus of a European army but a "model". It will be at the disposal of the Western European Union, Nato and the UN and its primary task may well be in disaster relief and in peacekeeping.

British convicts acquire taste for French 'porridge'

FROM BEN MACINTYRE IN PARIS

SCORES of British citizens jailed in northern France could apply to serve their sentences in Britain, but prefer instead to stay in French prisons, partly because the food is superior.

The British inmates are in no hurry to swap their French cells for British ones "because the cuisine and the comfortable conditions in prisons are distinctly better in France than in Great Britain", according to one British diplomat.

More Britons are in jail for drugs offences in northern France than in either Thailand or Malaysia. Prisons in the Nord and Pas-de-Calais region contain about 137 British prisoners, 95 per cent of whom are serving sentences for drug trafficking.

The French authorities have had to adapt to the influx of British convicts. At Longuenesse prison, near St Omer, volunteer prison workers recently began taking courses in English in order to communicate with the 50 British prisoners jailed there, while the British consulate has provided textbooks and dictionaries to help the inmates to learn French.

Under the UK-France Transfer Treaty, Britons convicted in France can elect to serve their terms on native soil, but not one has chosen to do so in the past year.

The food may be one reason. Prison fare in France is delicious by British standards, even offering such delicacies as local cheeses and a daily ration of French beer.

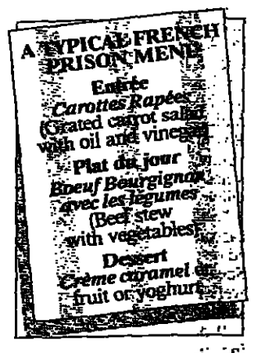

Gordon Williams, the British consul in Lille, recently visited Longuenesse and described the kitchen as very impressive. He said: "They even bring people in from outside to prepare the meals."

André Varignon, the deputy director of La Santé prison in Paris, said: "We serve classic French cooking: everything you can get on the outside, really." Such classic French puddings as tarte de pommes (apple tart) are served "rarely", not because they are considered too lavish but because they take too long to make, M Varignon said.

Breakfast does not include croissants, but inmates start the day with a tartine (bread and butter) and café au lait.

Some British prisoners, however, still complain about the cooking. "No matter how good the food, some people don't like it and say there is too much garlic," according to Duro Oluwo, of Prisoners Abroad, the London-based group that advises British detainees in foreign prisons.

"Some of these guys just want mash and chips," Mr Oluwo said, adding that while the standard of French prisons varies greatly they are generally "more modern and better equipped" than British ones.

But many British prisoners cannot afford to leave French prisons, even if they wanted to, because they must first pay French customs fines based on the street value of the drugs seized, often amounting to several million francs.

The relaxation of European border controls prompted a wave of drug trafficking, and last year the number of Britons held in continental jails grew by two-fifths.

While the food may be better, prison life in France is no picnic for Britons, who cannot speak French. As the magazine L'Express reported this week: "Arrested and convicted on French soil, these British citizens are then plunged into an isolation both penal and linguistic."

KGB agent says Moscow used aid money to pay its spies

FROM TOM RHODES IN WASHINGTON

THE KGB used aid money from the International Monetary Fund and other Western organisations in their last payment to Aldrich Ames, the former CIA officer who spent nearly a decade passing secrets to Moscow, according to a report that has sent tremors through the American intelligence community.

Ames, who pleaded guilty to spying for Moscow last year and is serving a life sentence, told American counter-intelligence officers last year that until 1993 the KGB had used old $100 bills as payment for his nine years as a CIA mole.

But in a meeting with his handler in Colombia in November 1993, documented in the CIA report published by The Washington Times yesterday, Ames received new notes in sequence amounting to $130,000 (£83,000). Yuri Karetkin, the KGB officer involved, said the money came from "aid money flowing into Russia from the IMF and other official sources". The cash was the last Ames received before his arrest in February last year.

A veteran counter-intelligence officer for 31 years, Ames first delivered documents to the KGB in 1985. They allowed Moscow to identify dozens of American and allied agents, at least ten of whom subsequently were executed while others vanished or were imprisoned. More than 100 intelligence operations inthe former Eastern bloc were closed down and two Russian military leaders, for more than a decade the most important sources for British and American intelligence, were exposed.

Ames's last payment has alarmed American intelligence agents who believe it may suggest that the KGB also used front companies in Russian joint ventures to obtain cash from American aid organisations. It may also obstruct attempts by the Clinton Administration to gain further money for Moscow from a congressional leadership opposed to foreign aid. President Clinton's priority in dealing with Russia has been to provide millions of dollars as an incentive to dismantle former Soviet nuclear weapons.

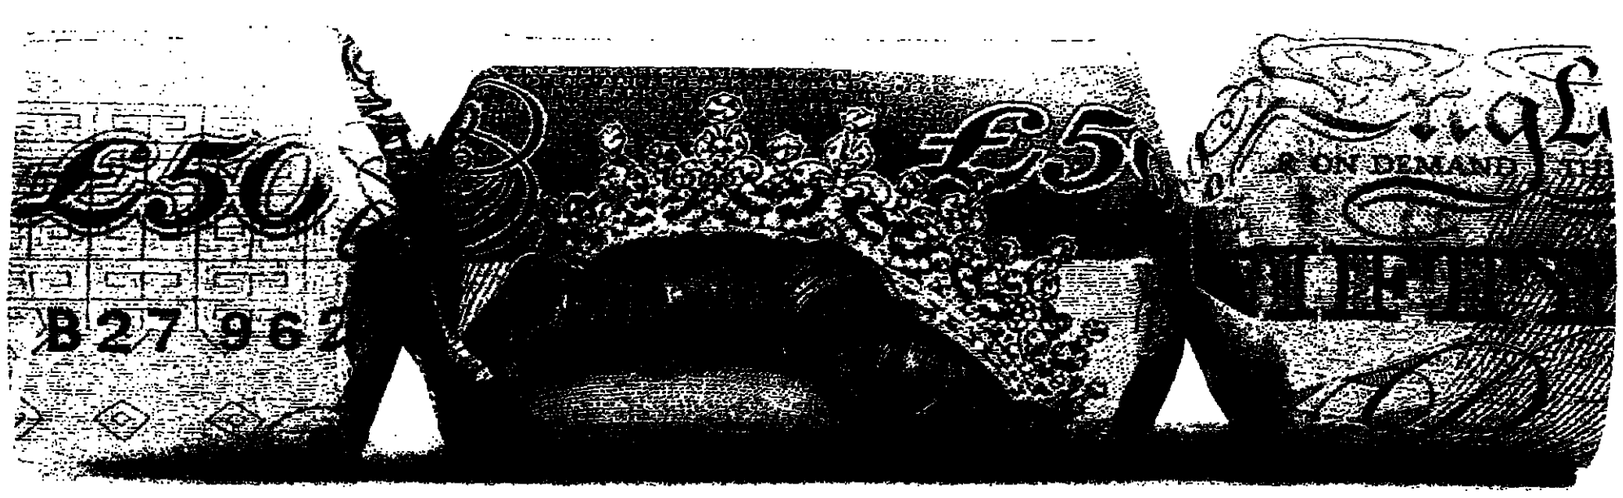

The IMF gave Russia $1.5 billion in 1993 and about $1 billion the previous year for debt relief after the break-up of the Soviet Union.

Moi's scandal-hit Bull tormented by Kenyan MPs

FROM SAM KILEY IN NAIROBI

KENYAN opposition MPs have called for the castration of the "Bull of Auckland" – a government official who was sent away from the recent Commonwealth heads of government meeting in New Zealand after allegedly indecently assaulting a chambermaid in his hotel bedroom. They have also identified him as Nicholas Biwott, a former Energy Minister.

The accusation against the close friend and business associate of President Moi was followed by foot-stamping from opposition MPs who shouted down Mr Biwott's attempts to "protest in the strongest possible terms".

During a lively emergency debate on the alleged incident in Auckland, Lawrence Sifuna, an opposition MP, said he had been telephoned by the husband of the chambermaid. The man said that Mr Biwott, a leading light of the ruling Kenya African National Union, had attacked his wife.

"Shame. Shame. We want to castrate the Bull," MPs shouted before being silenced by the Speaker, who told them they were in parliament and "not a kindergarten".

"I don't know what is exciting members," said Francis ole Kaporo, the Speaker. Unable to resist responding to the unintentional pun, opposition MPs replied: "The Bull". Kalonzo Musyoka, the Foreign Minister, refused to confirm or deny that Mr Biwott had been sent from Auckland to wait for the rest of the Kenyan delegation in Singapore. According to the Kenyan press, a grinning Mr Musyoka said that the accusations against Mr Biwott were "character assassination".

The parliamentary allegation is the latest in a series of scandals surrounding Mr Biwott, who so far has managed to emerge with his relationship to the President intact. The wealthy former holder of the industry and energy portfolios has been the source of diplomatic embarrassment to President Moi in the past. Although a member of Mr Moi's entourage during his last visit to Britain, he was barred from a luncheon at the Confederation of British Industry and sent away fuming.

Biwott: survived a series of scandals

The Kenyan Foreign Minister insisted that the privacy of the alleged victim was being protected, and said the alleged attacker should have the same right.

But Mr Musyoka has his work cut out in defending Kenya's international reputation, which has taken a hammering in recent months through a surge in crime. Two British Embassy staff have been wounded in carjackings and the Indian High Commissioner was almost killed during an armed robbery on his official residence. There has also been a government crackdown on opposition leaders and human rights lawyers.

Opposition MPs, many of whom have been subjected to police torture since Kenya was democratised in 1991, have used early-day motions to embarrass the Government and raise issues of corruption.

The results have raised parliamentary tensions. Last week Otieno K'Opiyo, an opposition MP, exchanged blows in the chamber with David Sankori, a ruling party member, who had called him a "con man" during an emergency debate.

Citizens of Johannesburg join hands in solidarity yesterday against what is seen as a tidal wave of violent crime

South Africans protest at rising violence

FROM REUTER IN JOHANNESBURG

THOUSANDS of South Africans stood for a minute's silence yesterday to mourn victims of violent crime. Soon afterwards, a lorry driver shot a policemen dead in a traffic dispute.

About 3,000 people turned out in Johannesburg, one of the cities worst affected by crime. In Cape Town, where only about 30 people joined religious leaders marching in the rain, William Bantom, the Mayor, called on the national and Western Cape Governments to take tough action against criminals. "We demand urgent action. Act now and act tough on criminals," he said, echoing a view that President Mandela's administration was soft on criminals, a criticism that the Government denies.

Small marches, protests and silences took place in cities and towns across the country. The Rhema Church, which organised the anti-crime day, said it had been hampered by the state South African Broadcasting Corporation's refusal to allow it airtime to televise public appeals for support. Newspapers said the corporation had decided as it did because the advertising campaign was too violent, the characters portrayed suggested that only blacks were involved in crime and that only the Government was held responsible for tackling crime.

About 50 people die every day in violent crimes in South Africa, where the commercial centre, Johannesburg, and the Indian Ocean port of Durban have been dubbed the world's murder capitals.

Apartheid inquiry to be led by Tutu

FROM INIGO GILMORE IN JOHANNESBURG

ARCHBISHOP Desmond Tutu has been appointed by President Mandela to head the controversial Truth and Reconciliation Commission which is soon to begin investigating human rights violations committed during South Africa's apartheid era.

The Nobel Prize winner's appointment was announced yesterday by Jakes Gerwel, the Cabinet Secretary. He said the formation of the 17 commissioners marked "an important stage in this historic process of coming to an understanding of our past ... conflict-ridden society".

Given that the Anglican cleric is highly respected across the racial spectrum, it was an expected and popular choice. Even so, he has taken on perhaps the most testing challenge of his career. Archbishop Tutu, a close friend of the South African President, is seen to be above party politics and has not shied away from criticising the ANC-led Government.

The commission will sift through more than 10,000 cases involving murder, torture and a range of abuses. It will decide whether to prosecute or grant amnesties. Its members include Chris de Jager, a former right-wing Conservative Party MP, whose appointment was opposed by the Human Rights Coalition because of his political background.

Muslims claim poll abuses in Egypt

FROM CHRISTOPHER WALKER IN CAIRO

PARLIAMENTARY elections in Egypt turned yesterday into a showdown between the ruling National Democrat Party, headed by President Mubarak, and the outlawed but previously tolerated Muslim Brotherhood.

Despite certainty that the National Democrats will maintain their two-thirds majority in the National Assembly, with 444 seats up for election, the Government ordered a crackdown on the Brotherhood and other candidates which went on as polling started.

Egyptian officials said that Mr Mubarak, who narrowly survived an Islamic assassination attempt in June, was determined to avoid a repetition of the situation in Algeria. There, Islamic militants gained legitimacy after unexpected gains in the first round of an election which, after it was annulled, degenerated into civil war. As polls closed last night, one man had been shot dead and 60 injured in nationwide scuffles, clashes and shootouts.

Electoral abuses claimed by the Brothers and allied Islamic candidates included the round-up of more than 600 activists and agents, detention of candidates by police, the barring of fair-play election monitors from hundreds of polling stations, and manipulation of electoral registers by the ruling party.

It was alleged that in one constituency where the brother of Atef Sedki, the veteran Prime Minister, was a candidate, boys of 16, two years under voting age, were openly casting their ballots.

A spokesman for the Islamicist-dominated Labour Party alleged that, by striving to prevent the 150 Islamic candidates winning, the Government could drive young Egyptians into the arms of militants advocating violence.

Tourists return to the Nile

BY CHRISTOPHER WALKER

EGYPT announced with relief yesterday that tourism was up by nearly a fifth this year, despite Islamic fundamentalist attacks. After two ruinous years, the country registered 2.6 million visitors between January and October.

The figures from the Tourism Ministry are taken by the Government as justification for its drive against Islamic militants since the militants' campaign to rid Egypt of its tourists and foreign businessman was launched in 1992. More than 60 militants have been executed, curfews have been imposed, thousands have been detained and, according to human rights monitors, torture has become routine.

During this time, militants have killed eight tourists, most of them Europeans, and injured 60, prompting a slump in revenues conservatively estimated at £2 billion.

Britain isolated on three key issues in leaked EU paper

FROM ROGER BOYES IN BONN

BRITAIN is set for conflict with its European partners at next year's follow-up conference on the Maastricht treaty, judging from the recommendations of a European Union "reflection group" published in Germany yesterday.

The document, "Strategy for Europe", will be completed this week and submitted to EU leaders at the Madrid summit later next month.

Britain is isolated on majority voting, the powers of the European Parliament and common foreign policy. On some issues, such as the integration of the Western European Union into the European Union, it shares its dissenting view with a few other member states. While these differences were expected, the document does highlight the failure of the "reflection group" to develop any but the most general of common recommendations.

The document, leaked to the reliable Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (FAZ), does not identify Britain by name but repeatedly refers to the disagreement of "a member". The FAZ says this is an unambiguous reference to David Davis, the Minister for European Union.

The majority of the group regarded it as desirable to extend majority voting in the Council of Ministers, to extend the rights of the Strasbourg Parliament to create a more effective common foreign policy, and to hand over many responsibilities for interior and justice issues to the Union. "A member" disagreed. The document says that "many of us" believed qualified majority voting should be used more frequently and as a general principle when the Union was enlarged. "Some members" believed qualified majority voting should be used in foreign and security policy. "One member is opposed as a matter of principle to such an extension," says the document in a clear reference to Britain.

It was unanimously agreed that there should be a joint foreign policy analysis and policy unit. All agreed that developing a European defence identity was desirable, in so far as it strengthened the Atlantic alliance. "This appears to have been unanimously agreed," says the FAZ, "but only a majority is in favour of strengthening the relations between the European Union and the WEU: the British representative did not belong to that majority and neither did the representatives of some of the neutral countries."

Theo Waigel, the German Finance Minister, fired another shot across French bows yesterday when he emphasised that entry to the European monetary union could only be decided in early 1998 on the basis of "hard substantial facts" from the year 1997, and not on earlier estimates.

"Anything else is not acceptable," he said in a tough statement delivered to the German parliamentary budget committee. France has unsuccessfully tried to insist that the decision be taken at the end of 1997 in order to avoid the controversial vote on which countries join the single currency occurring during the general election in the spring of 1998.

The minister set out the German timetable for monetary union in some detail. By next year he hoped for a common European approval of his proposal for a "stability pact" aimed at enforcing fiscal discipline on member states after entry to the EMU. The final decision on who was in and who was out of the EMU would come "as early as possible" in the year 1998. "A decision taken before 1998 would give rise to great uncertainty," said the minister, alluding to French demands that a decision be taken at the end of 1997 on the basis of economic forecasts.

Hans Tietmeyer, the Bundesbank president, addressing the same committee, emphasised yesterday that aspiring members of the EMU should abide by every one of the Maastricht conditions — and that included a minimum two-year membership of the European Exchange Rate Mechanism. Another essential condition, he said, was that an aspiring member state should have a fully independent central bank.

Plisetskaya acknowledges applause after dancing in Swan Lake at the Bolshoi

Plisetskaya: "to hell with those who say I should retire"

Ballet star turns 70 on Bolshoi stage

FROM THOMAS DE WAAL IN MOSCOW

MAIYA PLISETSKAYA, the Bolshoi Theatre's most famous star, celebrated her 70th birthday this week by carrying on dancing on her favourite stage.

On Tuesday night at the Bolshoi, her main concession to age was to dance the less demanding dying swan of Saint-Saëns, not that of Tchaikovsky. But with her green eyes, red hair and slight build, she still made a powerful presence and the audience gave her stormy ovations and cascades of red roses.

Critics have lamented her decision to go on dancing, but she has ignored them. "To hell with those who say I should retire," she said five years ago. "I am an artist, and as long as I can communicate through my artistry I will continue to perform."

President Yeltsin, who is in a sanatorium outside Moscow, sent his apologies and Viktor Chernomyrdin, the Prime Minister, kissed her on both cheeks before presenting her with a medal "For Services to the Fatherland". In Soviet days the Government named a planet after her.

She is not nostalgic for the Soviet Bolshoi. Her biography I, Maiya Plisetskaya, is full of biting characterisations. She left the theatre in 1989 and lives in Munich.

Santer vents his wrath on Kinnock

FROM CHARLES BREMNER IN BRUSSELS

JACQUES SANTER, the President of the European Commission, yesterday rebuked Neil Kinnock, the EU Transport Commissioner and former Labour Party leader, suggesting that weak character explained his recent public dissent on key EU doctrines.

Mr Santer's unusual swipe at one of his colleagues reflected the dismay caused in Brussels by the speech last week in which Mr Kinnock said it was unrealistic to expect monetary union to be launched on schedule in 1999 and that the Union was bungling its approach to new members from the East.

It was time to replace loose talk with more effective action, Mr Santer said, commenting on the climate of doubt as European leaders prepared to settle the final timetable for EMU at their summit in Madrid next month. Asked about demands yesterday in the European Parliament for Mr Kinnock's resignation, Mr Santer noted that the 20-member Commission was a college of equals, but it was his job as President to present its policy. "If there is one member of the college who hesitates, or expresses scepticism on certain points, I can only say that he may not have a strong enough personality to prevail in the college."

Santer: tried later to soften his criticism

Later, Mr Santer sought to soften the impact of his criticism. The British Commissioner's remarks were "damaging to the policy and purpose upheld by the College of Commissioners," he said. "I do not consider, however, that Neil Kinnock has a weak personality". He is a "very active, co-operative and efficient Commissioner, and I look foward to further working together," added Mr Santer.

While Mr Kinnock, a strong supporter of EMU, was only voicing thoughts which are widespread in Europe, his decision to utter them at a meeting of businessmen in Berkshire is seen as undermining the Commission's job as guardian of the purity of the Union's central project. Another Briton, Bernard Connolly, has been suspended from his post as a senior Commission official and is awaiting a disciplinary tribunal for denouncing the whole EMU scheme in his book, The Rotten Heart of Europe.

In combative mood, Mr Santer tried to sweep aside the doubters, saying: "EMU is firmly on the rails". He urged Union leaders to end the suspense over a name for the future currency. This was vital for winning public acceptance, he said.

The Commission also set out a scheme yesterday for a successor to the Exchange Rate Mechanism which would link the currencies of EMU member states to those of the non-members. The Commission hoped that, if Britain exercised its opt-out and stayed away from EMU, it would still take part in the new system.

WORLD SUMMARY

Parents of dingo baby seek ruling

Sydney: An inquest into the disappearence of nine-week-old Azaria Chamberlain resumed yesterday to rule formally on the circumstances (Vivienne Horner writes).

Azaria's parents Lindy and Michael Chamberlain claim that she was taken by a dingo at a campsite at Ayer's Rock in 1980. Her body has never been found. The couple has asked the coroner to rule that a dingo took their baby and clear them of involvement. The case has already been the subject of two inquests, a trial, two appeals and a special inquiry.

Maccabee tomb 'misidentified'

Jerusalem: Archaeologists said they had misidentified a tomb recently uncovered in Israel as that of a member of the Maccabees, a Jewish family whose rebellion inspired the Hanukkah holiday. Discovery of the burial site, during road-widening work, caused protests by tens of thousands of Orthodox Jews who claimed that the archaeologists were defiling Jewish graves. (Reuter)

Israeli jets raid border hideouts

Jerusalem: Israeli aircraft launched fresh raids on Islamic guerrilla hideouts in southern Lebanon in retaliation for rocket attacks along the border (Ross Dunn writes). There were no reports of casualties. Extra troops and several Israeli tanks were sent to the area. On Tuesday, Hezbollah guerrillas bombarded Galilee, wounding eight Israelis.

Cabinet meets as Papandreou is put on life-support machine

FROM MALCOLM BRABANT IN ATHENS

THE Greek Prime Minister, Andreas Papandreou, was yesterday clinging to life on a life-support machine.

As doctors denied that he was clinically dead, senior members of the Cabinet held an unscheduled meeting, ostensibly to discuss "education and social problems" but most probably to confront the succession issue from which, until now, they have shied away.

An American nutritionist was sent to Athens to try to help the Socialist leader, 76, to regain some of the 13lb he has lost from his emaciated frame since he was admitted to intensive care with pneumonia 11 days ago. Apparently Mr Papandreou's immune systems were collapsing, with his kidneys and lungs, making it difficult for him to fight off infection.

"The health of the Prime Minister has taken a turn for the worse and we have been forced to use a kidney machine and subsequently a respirator to support his breathing," a statement from his team of 24 doctors said yesterday.

Professor Gregory Skalkeas, of the Onassis Heart Centre, said, however: "The Prime Minister's brain and heart are functioning well. He is not clinically dead."

An army of senior government officials and party activists have set up camp in the Prime Minister's hospital, establishing what amounts to a parliamentary annexe, with Mr Papandreou's closest aides visiting him in relays round the clock.

Nearly all the 169 deputies of the Socialist Party (Pasok) that he founded 21 years ago have filed by his hospital bed, as have opposition figures.

Sources at the Prime Minister's official residence described the situation as grave but were clinging to the hope that he might recover.

Mr Papandreou's wife Mimi, 40, left the intensive care unit for the hospital chapel to light a candle for him early yesterday. In better times today, when hundreds of thousands of Andreases of Greek origin are celebrating St Andrew's Day, would have been a time of celebration for the Papandreou family. In Greece the name day is more important for Orthodox Christians than a birthday.

One Pasok member outside the hospital said yesterday: "I am ready to give [the Prime Minister] all of my organs as long as he lives."

In December we shall commence the first of our flight series from London Gatwick to Lusaka for the magnificent Victoria Falls. Here the weary traveller will find accommodations and sights that not only surpass that of other areas but probably offer a greater sense of 'being' than anywhere else on earth.

The Victoria Falls is a marvellous place both to relax in a temperate climate and to use as a base from which to explore with visits to the Falls themselves and the little town of Victoria Falls. In addition you may take a Zambezi cruise, enjoy local and regional game viewing in Hwange or Chobe (Botswana) with much besides.

On a selected number of departures we are making available just 20 seats at a special inaugural offer of between £515 and £595 for a 7-night stay at the comfortable, 4-star 'The Smoke that Thunders' Hotel, Livingstone, the closest hotel to the Falls themselves. Suu Kyi decides to boycott junta's democracy talks

FROM ABBY TAN IN RANGOON

THE main Burmese opposition group yesterday pulled out of a national convention drafting a constitution, further straining ties with the military regime bent on staying in power.

Aung Sun Suu Kyi, leader of the National League for Democracy, announced, however, that she was keeping the doors open for dialogue with the junta to ensure a democratic process in writing the new basic law that will be acceptable to the Burmese people.

The league said it would not be attending the national convention "until such time as the dialogue with a view to achieving national reconciliation, genuine multi-party democracy and a constitution that can win the support and confidence of the people has been successfully put into effect".

At a packed press conference at her lakeside home, attended by diplomats and the international press which converged in Rangoon to monitor a tense week in Burmese opposition politics, Daw Suu Kyi demanded: "If the league is not allowed to represent the views of the people, then why was the election held in 1990?"

The league won a majority of the legislature seats in that election, only to be nullified by the junta known as the State Law and Order Restoration Council. The council cracked down on the pro-democracy movement and put Daw Suu Kyi under house arrest for six years until her unconditional release in July.

The council responded to the opposition move in a low-key manner. The statement published in government media said the national convention will continue business as usual without the league.

The Government accused the league of trying to disrupt the convention, saying the boycott was "tantamount to totally forsaking and going against the national interests". Daw Suu Kyi repeatedly denied at her press conference she was seeking confrontation, but blamed the junta for refusing to talk to her on the restoration of democracy.

"Their refusal to dialogue is far more confrontational," said Daw Suu Kyi, 50, who won the Nobel peace prize in 1991 while in prison. She said she always believed in "give and take". She specifically called on her followers not to take to the streets.

Security was tightened outside the homes of three top league leaders last night after the boycott. The boycott capped what analysts saw as four frustrating months for the celebrated dissident whose freedom was meaningless to her as the junta continued to ignore her, and refused to start dialogue with her.

The league made the decision to boycott the convention after the Government did not acknowledge opposition concerns that the procedures for drafting the law were undemocratic as the party delegates were not allowed to discuss issues freely.

Last week Daw Suu Kyi issued a warning that the procedures were unacceptable. The national convention had been drafting a new constitution for three years. But when it reconvened on Tuesday, the league delegates walked out after the chairman of the convention, a ranking army general, did not respond to the concerns.

Analysts feel Daw Suu Kyi has to resort to lobbying the international community again — as she did for her release — to put pressure on the junta. At her press conference she urged the world community to support the United Nations resolution calling on the junta to open a dialogue with the opposition.

China's challenge gives Tibet two Panchen Lamas

FROM JAMES PRINGLE IN PEKING

CHINA set the stage for a potentially divisive battle with the Dalai Lama for the loyalties of Tibetan Buddhists yesterday after it selected a six-year-old boy as the next Panchen Lama over the choice of Tibet's spiritual head.

A religious ceremony was held — bizarrely by the atheist Chinese authorities — to pick the boy as the new Panchen Lama at the Jokhang in Lhasa, one of the Tibetan capital's holiest shrines. His name was drawn from a golden urn in front of a statue of the Buddha "in strict accordance with the rituals of Tibetan Buddhism", the official New China News Agency said.

The Dalai Lama, in May, had identified another six-year-old boy, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, as the reincarnation of the tenth Panchen Lama, who had died in January 1989. The Panchen Lama is traditionally the second most influential leader after the Dalai Lama.

The boy picked by the Dalai Lama is believed to be detained in Peking. China has refused to comment on his whereabouts. "He could be poisoned or eliminated in some other way," said a foreign Buddhist devotee in Peking last night.

Whatever his fate, Tibet now has two Panchen Lamas, one blessed by the Dalai Lama, still regarded as a god-king by Tibetans, and one approved by China, the powerful rulers of Tibet.

At the ceremony in the Jokhang yesterday, scene of past clashes between Tibetans loyal to the Dalai Lama and Chinese police, Gyaincain Norbu was picked as Peking's Panchen Lama. He was selected from among three candidates, none of whom had the blessing of the Dalai Lama.

"A situation where there are two Panchen Lamas has obviously the potential to provoke trouble and, is a possible formula for unrest," said a foreign diplomat here.

The Dalai Lama's government-in-exile in northern India said Peking's choice of Panchen Lama should be rejected as a "pretender". "The Chinese controlling Tibet have the power to do what they like, but for the Tibetans this is not acceptable," it said.

Foreign diplomats say China believes that controlling the Panchen Lama will strengthen its rule and that eventually it hopes to select the next Dalai Lama, thus eliminating the focal point of opposition to its oppressive rule in Tibet.

Neither Peking nor the Dalai Lama is likely to back down in the clash, which mirrors periods in the late Middle Ages when the Catholic Church had two Popes, say the diplomats. "Both sides have painted themselves into a corner," said one envoy.

Britons' drugs trial is delayed for tenth time

FROM ANDREW DRUMMOND IN BANGKOK

THE drugs trial of a British couple Sandra Gregory and Robert Lock in Thailand failed to go ahead again yesterday after being adjourned for the tenth time to allow a witness to appear.

Journalists and British Embassy officials attending the hearing in Bangkok were told that the manager of Bangladesh Biman airlines had failed to appear again despite the threat of arrest.

His continuing failure to appear has delayed the trial for more than six months. It means that Miss Gregory, of Sowerby Bridge, and Mr Lock, of Cambridge, have been awaiting trial for over two-and-a-half years.

They are charged with trafficking in 89 grams of heroin. Mr Lock, 30, has pleaded not guilty; Miss Gregory has pleaded guilty.

They were arrested at Bangkok's Don Muang airport in February 1993 as they were about to board a Biman Airlines flight to Tokyo.

Season of bad chests

MEDICAL BRIEFING

Dr Thomas Stuttaford

The deteriorating condition of the Greek Prime Minister, Andreas Papandreou, since being admitted to hospital for treatment for pneumonia is no surprise. Some particular features in a patient's past medical history point to a bad prognosis if he or she later develops a severe chest infection, acute bronchitis or pneumonia. So far as these possibly adverse factors are concerned, Mr Papandreou holds a nearly full hand. The Prime Minister is known to have suffered from previous cardiovascular problems. Even a rapid heart rate or high blood pressure in a patient may be enough to weigh the scales against an uneventful recovery. He has impaired renal function, is well into his seventies and has previously had severe chest infections. Dr Robert Wilson, of the Royal Brompton and National Heart and Lung Institute in London, has written about the pointers to a bad prognosis in cases of bronchitis and pneumonia in the medical journal Update.

Mr Papandreou will not be alone in his troubles. This is the season when pneumonia frequently complicates flu, and respiratory tract infections once again become medically important, since in recent years the organisms in our lungs have become more varied, more virulent, and better at resisting the standard antibiotics.

In general practice it is impossible to culture the sputum of all patients with bronchitis or pneumonia and it is recommended that they should be treated empirically, but not of course haphazardly. The doctor has to decide before prescribing the antibiotic which organism is likely to be causing the infection, and its probable response to any antibiotic, as well as making a judgment on the patient's natural resistance to an infection; for past history, as in Mr Papandreou's case, will also have a fundamental effect on the outcome.

Dr Wilson recommends that patients with a simple bronchitis, or a persistent productive cough from tracheo-bronchitis left over from a cold or flu, will probably respond to such basic antibiotics as amoxycillin, erythromycin, trimethoprim or tetracyclines. Conversely those who have severe chronic bronchitis, chronic bronchial sepsis, or more than three recent attacks of bronchitis — particularly if any of these conditions are associated with other medical problems — need the more expensive, but more effective, modern antibiotics. These include such preparations as Zithromax (azithromycin), Klaracid (clarithromycin) and Augmentin (amoxycillin/clavulanate). The more long-lasting the bronchitis and the more mucus present, the less efficient is the antibiotic at penetrating it and the bronchial tubes to which it adheres. The quinolone antibiotics are good at penetrating mucus, but are not suitable for treating pneumonia if there is any chance that it might be caused by pneumococci.

Klaracid and Zithromax are increasingly used in general practice as they are also effective against Chlamydia pneumoniae, an organism which, until recently, rarely figured in pathology reports, but is now not only associated with chronic bronchitis and pneumonia but is also found in the lungs of patients who develop angina — as well as in victims of strokes and transient ischaemic attacks.

People with no spleen need extra care

Surgeons are more reluctant to remove damaged spleens than they were ten years ago. Evidence has accumulated that the spleen is an important part of the body's immune system and that without it patients are much more likely to succumb to infection which others would shrug off.

So long as people drive cars, play contact sports, ski, climb mountains or ride, some spleens will inevitably be damaged beyond repair, leaving the surgeons no option other than to take them out.

The Department of Health has advised family doctors that all patients over the age of two without a spleen should be immunised with pneumonococcal vaccine which needs boosting every five years. They should also have injections against Hib and vaccination against meningitis A and C. Up to the age of 16 they should be taking antibiotics regularly and thereafter have easy access to them, so that they may be started immediately in the event of a bacterial infection.

This week's General Practitioner magazine gives warning that the two principal insurance companies providing protection for GPs against negligence claims have advised that doctors may be considered negligent if they do not take these steps to protect a patient who has had his spleen removed.

A survey carried out in South Buckinghamshire, where doctors have been encouraged to ensure that their asplenic patients are immunised, has shown that more than 80 per cent of the patients are now aware of the dangers and have been correctly vaccinated.

Red faces in an Ambridge household

The pharmacological effect of cannabis has become a talking point in The Archers. After the new boyfriend of the Aldridges' wayward daughter, Kate, added some of the drug to the casserole they fed to the older generation, the most striking effect, other than loss of inhibition, seemed to be a bright red face.

If the cannabis had been smoked rather than taken in the stew, there would be a much better chemical explanation for the change in complexion. The increase in the amount of carboxyhaemoglobin, which turns the blood bright red and diminishes its oxygen-carrying powers, is, according to a report in the journal Thorax, five times as great after smoking cannabis as it is after smoking tobacco.

The BMJ, commenting on the report, makes a plea for further investigations. If cannabis smoking can be shown to diminish the oxygen supply to people with intellectual impairment or chest or cardiovascular disease, the results would be serious.

Hot fluids, with or without cannabis, increase flushing, and if there is any tendency to acne rosacea, a chronic inflammatory disorder of the nose, cheek, chin and forehead, this will become more obvious. The recommended treatment for rosacea is with antibiotics taken either by mouth or applied as an antimicrobial gel, Metrogel. Diet makes no difference to rosacea; cutting out rich foods would not, in the long-term, be any more useful than avoiding Kate's hot stew.

Trying to figure it out: difficulties in learning to do simple arithmetic can turn some children off the study of mathematics for the rest of their lives

Crunching numbers

John O'Leary on dyscalculia, the new learning difficulty hindering bright children

Alex Sebley is 6ft 3in tall and heading, he hopes, for art college. People find it difficult to believe that this strapping, articulate young man of 16 has the mathematical ability of a nine-year-old.

Yet Alex's little-known handicap has dogged his school career and led his mother Diana into a lengthy battle with education bureaucrats. Psychologists have diagnosed dyscalculia, or mathematical dyslexia, but the local authority remains unconvinced. The dispute reaches a climax next week when Alex again stands to lose the extra support he receives at school.

A century after dyslexia was discovered it has at last become accepted that significant numbers of otherwise intelligent people struggle with the basics of literacy. But no such consensus exists in the realms of numeracy. Research is said to be 15 years behind that for language dyslexia, and those who cannot master the simplest arithmetic are simply dismissed as slow learners.

For many, however, the knack never comes. Number bonds that are second nature to pupils of similar intelligence never develop, tables refuse to stick and basic arithmetical processes remain a mystery. Even if sufferers move on to more advanced mathematical concepts, as many do, they are handicapped by an inability to complete simple tasks.

With hindsight, Alex suffered from number-blindness from his earliest days at school. But it was only when he applied to join his brother at Portsmouth Grammar School that alarm bells were sounded. The school warned his family of probable learning difficulties, which were confirmed subsequently by his middle school.

"I was never much good at maths, so I didn't think anything of it when he fell behind at first," Mrs Sebley says. "But he has never really progressed. Even though his IQ is above average, he still cannot use a digital clock."

Like many education authorities, however, Hampshire has pared its "special needs" provision to the bone, and is reluctant to provide extra tuition except for the most backward. Alex's "statement" — his passport to specialist teaching — has been withdrawn once — until Mrs Sebley got a barrister to put his case at a tribunal. If tomorrow's review results in another removal, she is threatening an injunction.

"People think he sounds perfectly all right, and won't accept that there's anything the matter with him," Mrs Sebley says. "But although his reading has improved, he just doesn't see numbers. They could be Greek to him."

Like other mathematical strugglers, Alex has poor short-term memory and particular difficulty with spelling. Sufferers tend to forget basic procedures such as how to subtract. Many suffer from the dyslexic's classic confusion of left and right.

Dyslexia specialists reel off similar cases. At Essex University, for example, Professor Christine Temple treated twins with IQs in the top 5 per cent of their age group, but who could not multiply four fours without going through a tortuous process.

Professor Temple believes talented mathematicians are being lost to the subject because their dyscalculia is not recognised before they become disheartened. "The difficulty they have is with a very simple logical element of arithmetic," she told Radio 4's All in the Mind last month. "They can still be quite gifted ... particularly in areas where geometrical skills or the ability to design in three dimensions are more important."

The experts differ on the existence of a discrete condition affecting mathematical competence alone, but few doubt that some form of dyslexia is impairing the mathematical development of thousands of young people.

Professor Tim Miles, of the University of Wales, Bangor, one of the leading academics in the field, says that at least two-thirds of dyslexics have difficulty with mathematics. But he is wary of elevating the condition into a new cause célèbre. "I think that fancy labels like dyscalculia can be unhelpful: neurologists have found nothing that selectively affects mathematics. I prefer to look at it as another symptom of dyslexia."

Whatever the label, there is no doubt the condition can be overcome. At the Helen Arkell Dyslexia Centre, in Frensham, Surrey, for example, teachers employ a "multi-sensory" approach to learning, using puzzles, contrasting colours and even building blocks to help sufferers to make the basic connections.

The Maths 100 foundation, which runs extracurricular courses, also claims a high level of success with the growing numbers of children referred to its clubs. The foundation finds that conventional remedial teaching, relying on reading and continual practice, does not work. Only painstaking explanation, using apparatus and diagrams at every stage, will make a lasting difference.

Cheryl Maiden, Maths 100's head of schools, says: "We see a range of cases, from those with a physical eye problem to hyperactive children and those who have a specific problem with maths. It is very easy for primary teachers to spot, but they simply are not trained to do it at the moment. Parents can pick it up, but they have to exercise caution because it is becoming fashionable."

The Dyslexia Institute, which assesses almost 6,000 children and adults each year, now includes mathematical testing in the process. Liz Brooks, the executive director, says: "Over half of the people referred to us have difficulties with maths. Whether they are specific to maths or part of a continuum of difficulties is impossible to say from the research. They are usually not so devastating as literacy problems, but they can still cause distress."

● Spotting the problem
Common symptoms of mathematical dyslexia, which usually appear around the age of eight, include:
Early hearing difficulty
Inability to spot number patterns, such as odd and even numbers
Difficulty in learning tables
Printing letters or numbers in the wrong order
Confusing numbers or writing them the wrong way round
Poor spelling
Unnaturally slow and/or erratic work
Poor mental arithmetic and estimation skills

● The next step
Assessment by a chartered psychologist to compare IQ with attainment. Registers should be in public libraries.

Kwai Once-A-Day and garlic's active ingredient
Allicin is garlic's main active property. It is not, as many people believe something that's in garlic. It's the agent which is produced when you eat raw, fresh garlic. But of course, eating raw garlic is not going to make you very popular, socially. And even fresh garlic cloves vary enormously in their potential to produce allicin.

Kwai Once-A-Day tablets, on the other hand, have a guaranteed allicin yield, and are made from the world's most potent source of allicin - specially selected and organically grown high quality Chinese garlic.

Kwai and a healthy heart
This means you're not just making a half-hearted attempt at looking after yourself. You're really tapping into nature's most respected, natural way of helping to maintain a healthy heart.

Kwai Once-A-Day tablets are odourless too. Coated 60 times to leave no trace of garlic on your breath.

So on balance, it's easy to see why Kwai could be even better for you than raw fresh garlic.

If you want more information about Kwai and your health please call the Kwai Information Line on 01628 60 22 99.

The joke that nearly ruined my life

Valerie Grove hears Gerald Ratner's plans to put that remark firmly behind him

CHRIS HARRIS

Off the gold standard: Gerald Ratner wants to get back into the business but his wife, Moira, wonders if he is "completely nuts"

Christmas is coming, and Gerald Ratner is getting twitchy. He longs to get back into the sparkle business. In the jewellery trade Christmas is crucial: the one time you can make a real killing. It is exactly three years since he resigned from the jewellery chain that bore his name, and he now has to watch his old company (renamed Signet) languishing in the doldrums, reporting a £21 million loss in the last half-year.

And he knows better than anyone that if it had not been for a single word — used routinely by the younger generation to describe a film, a hamburger or a T-shirt they dislike — he would still be flogging the gold stuff in Christmas presentation boxes.

I rather expected him to be a wide-boy wearing gold chains but Ratner, at home in his sunny house at Bray, wears nothing that glisters except a white gold Rolex. "I'm not mad about gold on men," he says. "I was never excited by jewellery. For me it was purely the excitement of the business, of selling."

It was in 1949, the year he was born, that his father started a jewellery shop in the London suburbs. Gerald, one of four children, the only boy, was outspoken even then. He was only 13, and at Hendon Grammar School, when at a teacher's funeral he boldly asked the aged headmaster why he didn't just stay at the crematorium. Already in trouble, he was expelled.

He didn't mind: he just wanted to leave school and all that (sorry) crap, and work in one of his father's jewellery shops. He had a flair for salesmanship: he was overjoyed to be out of school and good at giving customers the hard sell. "I'm quite a persuasive character and I enjoyed selling." And he already had ideas about jewellery shops. They moved into Oxford Street when he was 18 and he saw how fast the street traders could move their stock just by flagrant patter.

"Until those days, jewellery shops had always been dim, daunting places which people entered once or twice a lifetime: when they got married, and when they needed a retirement watch. It drove me mad. I was very frustrated."

When his father retired the business was losing money. "Samuel's had bought 20 per cent of us, and I thought 'I'm not going to be managing director for very long unless we do something'. And it had to be something dramatic. Burton and Next were doing phenomenal business and we were not getting the disposable income on a Saturday afternoon, we weren't part of the boom. I felt very left out of things. Other people were doing it: Terry Jordan was selling, and a jeweller called Robert Anthony was flourishing in Newcastle. I got there early one morning and found people queuing at his doors. Get the right product at the right price, and I knew we could do volume business. We had to lower our prices. Nobody was going to buy a £500 ring on impulse on a Saturday afternoon. We had 5,000 lines and we changed every one of them.

> 'No job, no payoff but he still went to the Caribbean'

"What we tuned into was gold chains and earrings. It was within people's reach to buy gold stuff instead of a belt or shoes, if they had twenty quid in their pocket. The 99p earrings were a bit of a loss leader, but people realised they could walk into a jeweller's with under a pound, instead of waiting until they had £1,000"

On the old Jack Cohen of Tesco's motto of "pile it high and sell it cheap" wares were blazoned on garish posters on shopfronts and incentive prizes offered to managers who sold most. And all went swimmingly. Ratner became the biggest jeweller in the world. He lived in The Grove, Highgate, a neighbour of Yehudi Menuhin and other grandees.

And then, in April 1991, he spoke at the Institute of Directors' annual convention at the Albert Hall. How, he asked rhetorically, could Ratner's sell a cut-glass sherry decanter and six glasses on a silver tray for £4.95? "Because it is total crap."

"The amazing thing was, I had made that joke so many times before. It had even appeared in the Financial Times in 1987. Everybody laughed at it. Goldman Sachs used to offer a Ratner's sherry decanter for the most efficient stock market analyst. I worked it into my act, whenever I did presentations or speeches. It always went down well."

For his Albert Hall appearance, he had prepared a straight and rather dull speech. Someone told him people expected jokes. So he slipped in the earring that cost less than a prawn sandwich, and the crap sherry decanter. "And suddenly the tabloids went berserk, it all turned very nasty — and the rest is history."

There were cartoons, jokes, comments in The Sun like "Spring is here, the leaves are turning green, and Gerald's jewellery is turning green." Ken Dodd would say: "All I had was a Ratner's St Christopher to protect me . . ." No best man's wedding speech was complete without a Ratner's joke. The nation guffawed.

At first, the impact of this avalanche of mockery was negligible. But people look in a jeweller's window six weeks before they buy: within six weeks of the fatal speech, "the sales really fell out of bed". "Everybody was unhappy; not just the people behind the counters, but all the people you have to please, like bankers, hated being associated with a company that was suddenly a national joke. I was peeing against the wind trying to change it. And it was a shame because I was in there at a very early age, I'd put my life into it and it was all thrown away over something stupid.

"The annoying thing was, it wasn't true! The stuff we sold was not crap. The sherry decanter — well, maybe. But you can't sell £1 billion of jewellery all over the world by selling crap. People in the trade know you have to conform to standards, you have hallmarks.

"Even intelligent people absolutely began to believe that everything we sold was made out of tin. We did once manufacture our own jewellery and that was crap: the diamonds were not good enough, the finish of the rings was not shiny. But by closing down our factory and buying elsewhere, we started getting the quality up. Yes, we slashed prices, but people bought because they were better quality products. Even McDonald's couldn't sell a rubber hamburger."

In the end he was forced to resign, in 1992. "I got home that day, on a rainy evening, with a sense of relief, because it had been the worst 18 months of my life. It was nice not to have to fight a losing battle any more." He had no job, and no payoff, but he went to the Caribbean anyway, and tried to wind down.

He sold a grand house on the river at Bray, and bought a less grand one round the corner, with a tennis court and swimming pool, at a rock bottom price. A framed photograph shows him laughing with his oldest friend from childhood, Michael Green, of Carlton. Ratner has spent the last year working three days a week at Tobacco Dock, the formerly moribund shopping mall at Wapping. In Florida, he observed how well "factory outlets" selling bin-end designer-label clothes were doing. So he is going to re-launch Tobacco Dock as a factory outlets mall. "I'm not going to make any forecasts about when, but I am going to get it open sometime, and it will make Covent Garden look ordinary."

But he cannot, at 46, twiddle his thumbs for half the week. His second wife, Moira (who has been "a rock" even when he was, for a regretted interlude, spotted with another woman) says: "It's all very well saying you want to spend more time with your family, but do your family want to spend more time with you?" There are two daughters from his first marriage, Suzy (an actress) and Lisa (learning photography) and two from his second, Sarah, aged six, and Jonathan, aged four.

And he cannot watch his old company languishing. "I can see the amazing mistakes that are made: like lighting. Jewellery has to be displayed properly. The difference it makes to sales is phenomenal, it must be pleasing to the eye. Supermarkets know all the tricks. We had a rule that diamond rings had to be displayed 42 inches from the ground, on the premise that the average woman is five-foot four and the trajectory of her sight falls at 42 inches."

Two Signet shareholders, Julian Treger and Brian Myerson, want management changes, and Ratner says he is one of the contenders who might well move in, come the new year.

The Nineties, he says, are like the Seventies — rather austere. The Eighties will not come back. But isn't there a dearth of interest in gold chains? "Argos and Goldsmiths group are doing all right and a guy called Warren James is opening two shops a week. He's wearing Ratner's old clothes and taking our market share. So I'm hoping to get back in there.

"My wife says, are you completely nuts? But it is the business I was in for 25 years — and I know the business back to front. You have all that expertise and you don't want to do anything else.

"I used to be very edgy. I hated dinner parties. I longed for them to end. Now I'm not as impulsive as I was. I'm calmer. I appreciate things. I exercise and work out at Cliveden, which is ten minutes away, my lifeline. I listen to music, as I haven't since I was 16. I read more. The mistake I made in the past was rushing in to things. But in three years now, I've made no mistakes."

Frenchwomen weigh seven-and-a-half pounds less than their British counterparts, but they lose out in fun, says Kate Muir

FOR FOREIGNERS, the sheer womanliness of the French female is a continuing mystery, a secret code everyone would like to crack.

Parisian women not only have a gut instinct for elegance, but they also cook exquisite little ragouts for their husbands, conduct grand amours during working lunches, and have children who never, ever dirty their sailor suits. More humiliating still, they also tend to know who Carson McCullers is.

This extraordinary combination of sensual and intellectual skills has been inherent in the bourgeois female for years. The proof comes in this month's 50th anniversary edition of French Elle and December's 75th anniversary edition of French Vogue. Both have printed reams of photographs through the decades. The pictures are shockingly similar — a serious case of plus ça change. Fashion may alter, but the Frenchwoman remains as chic, clean and perfectly behaved as ever.

The reason is that she is bombarded with messages to be chic wherever she goes. In Parisian clothes shops, assistants paw and pin you until satisfied with the silhouette, or tell you frankly that Madame does not suit puce.

There are mirrors in every public room or hall, and if you add to this the depressing statistic that French women weigh seven-and-a-half pounds less than their British counterparts, some of the elegance is explained.

Then there are the glossy magazines, which keep Parisiennes properly informed about the best books, exhibitions, mushrooms, and the life of writer Carson McCullers — "a veritable ballad of unlucky love".

Biba magazine recently revealed how to cope with having a husband, a family, and a lover all at once, advice which for Frenchwomen is as ordinary as how to get a great fake tan.

THE PIECE was full of useful tips on juggling "the fires of love and the cinders of marriage", such as buying your husband and lover the same aftershave to avoid olefactory detection after a "working lunch".

And every Saturday Le Figaro features a vegetable of the week, with titles like "Fascinating Celery" and "Beautiful Beetroot". This was topped by the recent move into fish: "The Sardine: Blue Princess."

But there is something irritatingly constipated about all this keeping up of appearances. Frenchwomen may be thinner, they may even have a husband and a lover, but they definitely have less fun.

Last weekend as I walked down Boulevard Hausmann, two glamorous young women came towards me — their nipped waists and expensive shoes indicating Frenchness. But they walked with confidence and swing, horsing around. They laughed and talked loudly. They dared to take up more space on the pavement.

Their voices, as they passed, were British.

■ Now employers must not only accommodate women, but must expect them to become lone parents

London Underground told Susan Edwards, a single mother: "You can be a train driver or a mum." Those words would once have had to be considered a triumph for feminism. In my childhood, nobody thought of offering women much choice at all — physical fertility permitting — about whether they would eventually be mums, and the idea that driving trains could be a female career option would have been risible. But time moves on. The idea that women now have a choice between motherhood and train-driving — or firefighting or soldiering or frontline policing — is not enough. What Ms Edwards wanted was to be both a train driver and a single mother — at the same time.

An industrial tribunal ruled this week that she had every right to have that wish fulfilled. The words "you can be a train driver or a mum" were regarded as legally damning. So the Underground will now have to pay compensation to Ms Edwards for the "injured feelings" which that statement caused. The Underground now recognises, Ms Edwards says, that the words reflected an "inappropriate attitude" toward female employees. This judgment will have helped the Underground to re-educate its attitudes — as they used to say in China during the Cultural Revolution.

> She insists on being a train driver and a single mother

For the tribunal decided that failing to accommodate the needs of a single mother in its organisation of shift work counted as sexual discrimination. When Ms Edwards began as a Tube train driver, she worked day shifts only. But a change in the rostering system, introduced in 1992 to increase efficiency, meant that she would have had to accept combined early and late shifts. Being a lone parent made that impossible. So she opted for voluntary severance and sued her former employer for forcing her out of her job.

The logic of the tribunal's finding — never mind the wider justice — is dubious. The argument must go something like this: since all women are potentially single mothers, being a single mother is inherent in the female condition. Thus to create working conditions which cannot be met by single mothers is to discriminate against all women.

Equal opportunities legislation rests on the premise that it is wrong to discriminate against people on the grounds of gender or race — that is, for conditions over which they have no control. One can plausibly argue that potential motherhood is intrinsic to the female condition — although I don't think it follows that all women have an absolute right to working conditions which will be favourable to them through every moment of their maternal cycle. But is potential single motherhood an inescapable part of femaleness? Are all women unfairly disadvantaged by any demand from an employer that cannot be met by the single mother of a young child?

Before the whole thrust of equal opportunities law is discredited by absurd rulings, an urgent question must be addressed: is it now illegal for any job to include conditions which preclude any possible liability that only a female would be likely to encounter? Or, to put it another way, does equality for women demand special treatment for every eventuality that our biology may present? If so, should it not also be illegal to create working conditions which are especially detrimental to menopausal women (too hot an office) or to those who are recovering from hysterectomies (lifting heavy objects)?

It used to be said — in the quaint old pre-feminist days — that employers were reluctant to hire young married women because they were likely to become pregnant. Now they must apparently refrain from creating any working practice which will effectively rule out the combining of work duties with the doubly restricting responsibilities of single parenthood. In fact, before London Underground introduced its new rostering arrangements, it spent a good deal of time entertaining precisely this possibility. For roughly a year, Tube management and unions discussed a plan called the "single-parent link".

This would have provided 11 special shifts at the ends of lines which would have involved working only "social hours". Single parents — in practice meaning single mothers — would have been invited to apply for these shifts. But the plan was rejected, largely because the unions would not accept it. The collapse of that project counted against the company, since the tribunal felt that the fact of its having been considered meant that the Underground had recognised the problem and sought a solution.

Now I am normally the last person to offer support to a rail union, but in this case, I can see its point. Would this specially privileged group of drivers on favourable shifts be paid the same as those working unsocial hours? If not, would that lower rate of pay not count as sex discrimination too? And what of all the male drivers whose unsocial shifts would rob them of time with their children? Their wives might argue that parenting is not just a woman's responsibility. But in the world of equal rights, some women are clearly more equal than others.

Monarchs and Presidents show that élites are bred and not born — but Labour cannot admit it

William Rees-Mogg

I've been intrigued by the fact that General Colin Powell turns out to be a descendant of King Edward I. He derives his Plantagenet blood through Sir Eyre Coote, himself a general and a nephew of a greater general, who was Governor of Jamaica early in the last century.

By 1800, the genes of King Edward I must have been widely spread: if one allows three generations to the century, there would have been 15 generations between the King and Sir Eyre Coote, and another four between Sir Eyre and Colin Powell. Even on a replacement basis, 15 generations would produce 32,768 current descendants, and another four generations would raise that number to over 500,000. Nevertheless, Edward I seems to be a good bloodline for military leaders. Apart from Colin Powell and the two Cootes, his descendants include Nelson and Wellington.

The Plantagenet gene was even more powerful in the immediate period of its history. Between William the Conqueror and Elizabeth I there were 23 English monarchs, successively of the Norman, Plantagenet and Tudor dynasties. Of these, 11 were great rulers who overcame the historic challenges of their periods: five were in different ways disastrous, and seven were mediocre. Such a record compares favourably with the average standard of democratic leadership. That is unexpected, because one would suppose that competitive election would usually produce abler leaders than genetic inheritance. Of course, medieval monarchs had to be competitive, not least on the battlefield.

Between 1066, when William the Conqueror won the Battle of Hastings, and 1485, when Richard III lost the Battle of Bosworth, there were 18 Kings of England. In this century, so far, there have been 18 Presidents of the United States. My ranking of either group has to be subjective, though I think it comes close to what a consensus of historians might produce. The 18 Norman and Plantagenet Kings of England seem to have included eight of the first class — William I, Henry I, Henry II, Edward I himself, Edward III, Henry IV, Henry V and Edward IV — five of the second class, and five of the third, of whom King John was the nastiest and Henry VI the most ineffectual.

The 18 Presidents of the United States in the 20th century do not include quite as many great men, or quite as many duds. The two Roosevelts, Woodrow Wilson, Truman, Eisenhower, perhaps Kennedy, and Ronald Reagan are all arguably great Presidents; Harding, Coolidge and Ford — all three of them Republicans — were not up to the job; the remaining eight have been mediocre. Of course, if one took the Hanoverian line after 1714, the royal result would look less impressive, but the Hanoverians were brought over to be constitutional monarchs, and have largely left the business of government to their Prime Ministers.

In the 20th century, the hereditary principle has been widely discredited in application to human beings, though it is still generally accepted for race horses. Yet the more the scientists discover about the human brain, the more clear it becomes that brain structures are genetically determined physical realities, like our noses or our muscles.

People are just as likely to inherit grandmother's brains, or parts of them, as they are to inherit the shape of her ears or the colour of her eyes. What science cannot decide, and may never be able to decide, is the relative significance in terms of mental ability of this genetic inheritance and of the environment. Kings are successful both because they have the necessary mental attributes and because they are trained to be kings. It seems likely that training on its own cannot produce a great monarch, anymore than it can produce a Derby winner.

The successful Plantagenets and the successful Presidents seem to have inherited a good mixture of different mental qualities, rather than an exceptionally high intelligence. Apart from Woodrow Wilson, none of the 20th-century American Presidents has had the intellectual quality one would associate with senior academic standing. Theodore Roosevelt was undoubtedly highly intelligent, but two of the most successful Presidents, Franklin Roosevelt and Ronald Reagan, struck contemporary observers as highly intuitive but intellectually shallow, lacking any logical rigour.

Modern studies of the brain seem to suggest that its working depends on neural networks. This seems to be familiar from political leadership. Successful leaders have an effective relationship of different mental qualities, rather than a single quality, highly developed. There may be some intuitive mental function which enables the leader to dominate the will of other people. You did not say "no" to Edward I; you did not say "no" to Wellington; you would hesitate to say "no" to Colin Powell. The Plantagenets had a gene of command, whether Colin Powell inherited it or not.

If Charles Murray and Richard Herrnstein are right in their book, The Bell Curve, we are already moving back into a gene-dominated society, in which the best jobs will be gained by the very bright people, the "cognitive élite". They marry each other in the same way that royal families have always inter-married. On this view, the factory age of this century has been an exceptional period of mass-production and relative equality of incomes, in which the politicians have won votes by high public spending and massive transfers of wealth.

If the "bell curve" argument is right, the 21st century will be dominated by the bright and well-educated users of international systems of communications, who will work in whatever environment is most attractive to them. By 2010, it will be technically possible for a surgeon living in Bermuda to operate on a patient in a London or New York hospital. That freedom of geographical location will give the cognitive élite substantial independence of the nation-state. The exceptional gene will earn its market value.

In current British politics there is a fascinating contradition. The Labour Party is the traditional party of the mass industrial worker, of what Karl Marx labelled the proletariat. The Conservative Party has represented the professional and property-owning classes, the élite of their time. Yet since 1979 the Labour Party has come to be led by a group who themselves belong to the cognitive élite. A good indicator of élite membership is the high earning power of wife and husband. Mrs Blair undoubtedly earns more than Tony — the Bar pays better than politics. They both have excellent genes for cognitive intelligence, and have made a cognitively appropriate marriage.

For Labour, this has advantages and dangers. If the very bright people are the new social and economic élite, then they will dominate politics. As Tony Blair and his immediate associates are members of this group, they already understand what it wants. There is a great rapport between the cognitive élite of Labour politics and of the modern media. They are blood siblings. The contradiction is that the Labour Party exists to support the interest of the masses. I may use the word "élite" as a term of praise, but Labour can hardly do so. In the longer run, the Conservative Party seems the natural party for the cognitive élite, just as it was for the old bourgeoisie.

The proposed abolition of the voting rights of hereditary peers will be no contradiction to this. The British peerage stopped breeding for brains at least 150 years ago, and started to breed for looks. The hereditary principle is very strong in the cognitive élite, but it is best expressed in Dimblebys, Aitkens, Jays and Bottomleys, Waughs and Amises rather than in Dukes or Marquesses. Perhaps the Conservative Party should now look for the grand old leadership gene of the Plantagenets. Are there any Tory descendants of King Edward I in the present House of Commons, or shall we have to go to Jamaica to find them?

Buying time for Ulster

Paul Bew on John Major's successful fudge

At first sight, the late-night summit in Downing Street looked like a panic reaction to the arrival of President Clinton. When the dust cleared and the communiqué was issued, it was clear that the two Prime Ministers had fudged the issue and yet pulled off a coup.

What do the two Prime Ministers gain from their late-night tryst? The short answer is the support of the most powerful man in the world, President Clinton. The White House had studiously refused to support the British position on decomissioning of arms. Now, however, there is little chance that the President will rebuke the British Government for dragging its feet, as parts of Dublin's more nationalist press — perhaps prompted by leaks from the American Embassy — had been predicting.

The British claim that more objective attitudes on Ireland now prevail in America's National Security Council. They also point out that the 15,000 British troops offered in support of President Clinton's Bosnia policy give London some leverage. But Whitehall still had some fears about Clinton's speeches in Belfast and Londonderry.

Now, however, President Clinton is at one with Mr Major and Mr Bruton. His support for a package which will seem to many to have been arranged in his honour ensures that Mr Bruton's enemies in the Irish Opposition, Fianna Fail, and in Sinn Fein will have to tone down their criticism.

Sinn Fein and the Democratic Unionists are likely to have serious problems accepting this new proposal, but those who stand out against it will face the combined pressure not of two Governments, but of three — the third being that of the world's last superpower. This is rather more difficult for Sinn Fein than it is for the Democratic Unionists. Unionists are used to living without political friends beyong Ulster, whereas Sinn Fein has recently grown rather addicted to their support.

The Anglo-Irish agreement, signed ten years ago, was supposed to end megaphone diplomacy. Yet since the planned summit between Mr Major and Mr Bruton collapsed in September, negotiations have been drowned out by a series of squabbles in London, Dublin and New York. The British issued a formal riposte at the United Nations to a speech by Dick Spring, the Irish Foreign Minister, and there was an unseemly row over a speech by Mr Bruton in London.

In recent years, the negotiations have turned into a high-spirited game in which each side blackens the other's reputation before signing a deal. This has been a game of poker at which John Major has excelled, through his command of the black political arts. First there was the Brussels declaration of October 1993, against "secret deals" and apparently against the united strategy of the Northern Ireland nationalists, both Sinn Fein and the SDLP.

According to a recent book by Sean Duignan, the Taoiseach of the day, Albert Reynolds, believed that Mr Major was far more sympathetic to the plans put forward by Gerry Adams and John Hume than he could admit in public. As Duignan writes, "Hume-Adams was being declared dead in order to keep it alive".

Then came the Downing Street declaration of December 1993, in which the balance of advantage again clearly rested with Mr Major. This was followed by the so-called "framework document" of February 1995, the one hand in the game which the British side palpably lost. In its anxiety to sustain the republican ceasefire at the time, the British signed without achieving their principal negotiating objective, which was an explicit commitment from Dublin that in the event of an acceptable settlement, it would remove from the Republic's Constitution its territorial claim to Ulster. Even so, Mr Major gave himself an escape clause by insisting upon "agreement of the parties" and a referendum on the framework proposal.

But this week's progress is not all good news. Mr Bruton once said: "The worst possible scenario would be if the Government initially set strict terms, but was forced to relax them under threat of a resumption of violence." Yet today the Irish Government is hoping that the new international body will evade the precondition that talks cannot begin without at least some IRA disarmament. The British, of course, hope that the body will suggest a procedure by which the IRA can hand over arms.

In the end, the result of this week's intensive diplomatic manoeuvring may be that the IRA can no longer play the American card, or even the Dublin card — and this could eventually lead to splits in the republican movement. Whatever happens, Mr Major has bought himself a few more months of peace, and precious time to plan the next masterly fudge.

No, John, no

LAVATORIAL matters will be of pressing concern during President Clinton's visit to Northern Ireland today. Members of Derry City Council, who will greet Clinton at a civic reception at the Guildhall, Londonderry, have been informed that they will be prohibited from visiting the lavatory when he is there.

At a council meeting on Monday, the town clerk, John Keanie, advised all councillors that for security reasons they should ensure they make use of the "facilities" before the President arrives. They were told they would have to be in place in the main hall well before Clinton arrives for the reception, and that once inside, there would be no escape for at least two hours.

The real concern is that the councillors are planning a lunch in the best Irish tradition beforehand, with the requisite pre-prandial drinks. "The wine will have been flowing — what else are we expected to do during that time?" says the deputy mayor, Richard Dallas. "I think I'll be carrying a bag with me, in case I'm caught short."

The President and First Lady will not be inconvenienced by these security measures. A lavatory and washbasin have been specially installed in the Guildhall for their use. "We've put a good quality bathroom suite in a room that has been spruced up for them," says a representative. "It will be for their use only."

DIARY

Ahoy Bellow

THE LITERARY circuit in New York is humming with news of the possible defection of Saul Bellow, the distinguished American writer, from his agent of 25 years to Andrew "The Jackal" Wylie. It was Wylie who secured the whopper of a deal for Martin Amis — an advance of around £500,000 for his novel The Information.

Bellow is admirably represented by Harriet Wasserman, and is working up to his 11th novel. She denies any knowledge of a change in their relationship, but a babble of gossips has it that Bellow, who was 80 in June, accepts this will be his last book and he plans to make a commotion in the literary world. If a commotion is what he is after, the Jackal would comply only too happily.

After puffing and panting up endless winding staircases to reach the roof, the confused creature refused to emit even a yelp. Only when its owner was winched up on a crane to look the dog in the eye and promise a lifetime's supply of choccy-drops did the woofing start and the clapperboard come down.

AFTER THE VISIT

The IRA must still decide if it is ready for democracy

The Anglo-Irish deal forged on the eve of President Clinton's arrival in Britain was a compelling display of diplomatic brinkmanship. Until the last moment, it was widely predicted that the President's trip would come and go without a breakthrough in the peace process. But, as The Times reported on Monday, the Americans were quietly confident that a significant announcement would indeed be made to coincide with Mr Clinton's arrival. That confidence has been impressively vindicated.

The President's satisfied expression as he stood with the Prime Minister outside Downing Street yesterday morning said it all. An international disarmament commission will now begin its work, heading towards all-party talks in February. "It is not for us to get into the details," Mr Clinton told reporters, before moving on to fresh questions and issues new.

That is the privilege of the distant peacebroker. No such luxury, however, is going to be available to George Mitchell, the former Senator proposed as head of the commission, for whom the next two months will represent a daunting challenge. His team now faces a unique task: the disarmament of the best-organised paramilitary group in the world and the consequent integration of its political wing into the constitutional process.

The practical complexities of decommissioning are immense. Although most IRA weaponry is held in the Republic of Ireland, there are also significant caches in Ulster and on the mainland. Mr Mitchell would have to devise ways of collecting firearms and Semtex explosives in many different locations. The men of violence will require assurances that the weapons they deposit will not be used as forensic evidence in prospective criminal investigations. They will also fear that participation in decommissioning will mark them out as members of banned organisations, liable to subsequent arrest if the peace process were to fail. These will not be easy questions to resolve.

The commission may do more harm than good. It will provide the IRA with a new forum in which to set conditions for disarmament. The worst possible result of Mr Mitchell's inquiry would be a shopping-list of demands to be met before republican terrorists hand over a single round. He must therefore concentrate upon decommissioning procedure rather than upon political expectations. If all-party talks are really to start business in February, the commission must before then present a detailed timetable for comprehensive disarmament of republican and loyalist terrorists. Nothing else will do.

Ireland's history counsels against over-optimism in this case. Nonetheless, the agreement reached by John Major and John Bruton is a genuine achievement and a welcome one. This time last week, IRA sources were giving warning that a resumption of violence was imminent. Now the ceasefire seems safe at least until the commission has reported. In return for British acceptance of an early target date for talks, the Irish Government has categorically accepted that the IRA and the British military presence in Ulster are not morally equivalent.

The Prime Minister and Taoiseach also agreed on a mature approach to the so-called "Washington Three" principle that all-party talks cannot begin until the IRA has made a token act of disarmament. This precondition is a sensible one and it remains. But the British Government has raised no objection to the Mitchell commission exploring other ways of securing cross-party confidence in the next round of negotiations. If the commission can devise a new schedule for disarmament which allays the fears of the Unionist community, so be it.

The hope must be that Mr Mitchell makes such progress in the weeks to come that "Washington Three" is made irrelevant by the pace of events. Ideally, disarmament should begin early next year and progress during 1996. The IRA must be made to realise that American goodwill — and funding — are not unlimited. Republican terrorists are being asked not to surrender but to behave as democratic politicians. For men habituated to bloodshed, this is a difficult prospect; but the IRA should be in no doubt that the opportunity now presented to it will not soon come again.

ALONE AGAIN, OR NOT

Beware Continentals who speak of isolation

Britons must stand by for several weeks of pundits proclaiming "Britain isolated in EU". Germany's Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung set the tone yesterday by quoting a report on its way to next month's EU summit which confirms that Britain is alone in opposing any increase in the powers of the European Parliament, extension of majority voting and in particular its use in deciding common foreign policies. The EU's leaders can relax in the knowledge that they will be able to enjoy the traditional Christmas pastime of moaning about Britain's futile and lonely intransigence.

John Major should and will ignore the fuss. The Reflection Group of ministers and diplomats who will report to the summit is a rehearsal for the actual negotiation of any revisions to the Maastricht treaty. The intergovernmental conference starts next spring and will probably not end until after the general election. Positions taken now can hardly be taken as final. The rest of the Reflection Group's report will reveal that the grand project of writing "Maastricht Two" has shrunk to an ill-assorted set of ideas for cosmetic adjustments to the original, misshapen treaty of 1991.

Some of those ideas are provoking sharp divisions between Britain's partners. Pressure for more majority voting and power for the European Parliament will not go away and the arguments for them remain unconvincing. But the best tactics to exploit divisions among Britain's partners in the endgame are not yet clear.

By the time that final phase arrives — perhaps 18 months from now — the battlefield of ideas may look quite different. The Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary have other more important European issues to preoccupy them for the time being. The shape, success or perhaps even survival of the EU will not be decided in the intergovernmental conference but by the fate of the plan for monetary union and by progress towards the EU's highest current obligation: helping Eastern Europe by including them in the Western clubs of the EU and Nato. Moreover long conferences playing elaborate word-games with treaty articles on subsidiarity or "transparency" will not do much for Europe's competitiveness against Asia.

The agenda for revising Maastricht which so far carries unanimous or majority support is neither a rethink of the Union's constitution from first principles nor a way of securing greater public support for closer European integration. The list of possible changes on the table is a dismal combination of items left undone in 1991, the increasngly small overlap between France and Germany's wish lists and the usual ragbag of special pleading from vested interests.

The isolation which will matter over the next few years is the gulf between Europe's political classes and their electorates. Chancellor Kohl and President Chirac know that they can bring a single currency into existence only by imposing it in the face of public indifference and resistance. Europe's peoples know — even if their leaders do not — that the weighting of votes for the Council of Ministers is not the most urgent problem for the continent.

SPACE APE EMERITUS

Nasa's simian astronauts soon move to the Bonzo Sheraton

Imagine that you are an elderly chimpanzee. Easily done. You have surely imagined worse things before. Imagine, next, that you have been to outer space as well — in an American craft — dressed in the sort of plump, inflammable suit that Savile Row's tailors would struggle to match.

Now read on. Only good news follows.

The United States Air Force is about to open a luxury home for chimpanzees, those endearing and essential astronauts who once ventured beyond the ionosphere in the loyal service of Nasa's boffins. These monkeys — like the dogs which the Soviet Union once propelled spacewards with less scientific profit — ran risks that men were unprepared to take. And a grateful America has now chosen to reward them.

The United States Air Force will soon begin to construct a home-from-space. Many, if not most, of the original space travellers have died, and the residents are likely to consist mainly of their callow descendants. But the idea is a noble one, and its conception is proof — if proof is still required — of that excellence of sentiment which distinguishes America from less fortunate places.

The cost of this haven for Nasa chimpanzees, and for others of that ape-ilk, promises to be stratospheric. As we report on page thirteen, the US Air Force has disclosed that it will spend up to $100 million on the enterprise. Nasa can now boast proudly that its old monkeys are turned not into salami, or petfood, but into coddled pensioners. Not since Ronald Reagan's Bonzo went to college have American chimpanzees been treated with such sensibilité.

But how does one spend $100 million on a simian retreat? A chimpanzee's tastes are normally quite simple, even those of one who has travelled in a spacecraft for God and America. He should, rightly, need no more than an inexhaustible supply of bananas (the United Fruit Company could surely arrange a discount) and a variety of gaily-painted swings and roundabouts on which to frolic.

Perhaps the money will be spent on liveried flea-pickers. "Would you like that little creature removed from under your left armpit, madam?" they might ask, with expensive obsequiousness. "Would you like your buttock scratched, sir, while you eat the flea I have just picked off the lady?"

Servants like these will not be cheap, of course... but $100 million? There must be something else that soaks up all that cash. Actually, we have this theory: it must be those damned costly consultants again. Even chimps have them, you know.

Fudge as path to an Irish solution

From the Reverend Stephen Kingsnorth

Sir, What is a "fudge" (report, "Breakthrough in Ulster peace talks ...", later editions, November 29)? Is not the truth that it is a matter of words, that it is necessary to find the formula which will enable both sides to meet the needs of their constituencies without loss of face?

Over to the commission, the proposed international body to be set up to discuss the disarmament of the IRA and other paramilitary groups. Decommissioning has always been militarily irrelevant. After all, what does decommissioning mean?

Over the months British troops have been withdrawn from the streets of Ulster in stages — taken out of the field. Surely in a commission report that welcome process can be recognised and a continuing programme confirmed. The Government can claim the process was happening anyway. Sinn Fein can claim Britain has a programme of "decommissioning".

In parallel, a programme can be devised relating to IRA weapons to be withdrawn from the field, into the custody of, say, some Irish-American body. The Government can claim the decommissioning of arms has begun. Sinn Fein can proclaim that there has been no surrender, but a congruent process of decommissioning.

Everyone will have a form of words satisfactory to their respective audiences. If that is a fudge, it is to be welcomed. Let us be frank. Confidence will not be earned by acts of decommissioning. The task will be far harder than that. And the humiliation of one side has never been a promising start for the resolution of conflict.

Yours faithfully,
STEPHEN KINGSNORTH,

Vespers at Westminster

From Sir Sigmund Sternberg

Sir, I read with interest today's letters regarding the Queen's decision to attend vespers tomorrow at Westminster Cathedral, at which I will represent the Chief Rabbi. I noted the reminder by Dean Bradshaw of the reference by Pope Paul VI in 1970 to the Church of England as an "ever-beloved sister".

I recalled the occasion in 1986 when I accompanied the Pope on his first visit to the Rome Synagogue. His reference then to the Jews as our "elder brother" was extremely well received at the time and often quoted since.

There is an obvious lesson to be learnt from these references in the progress towards better understanding between the faiths.

Consensus politics

From Mr Richard A. Fagence

Sir, I challenge Peter Riddell's assertion ("Her Majesty's controversy", November 20) that a hung Parliament, with no overall majority, would be the certain result should any system of proportional representation be adopted in this country.

No government with an overall majority of voters has been elected in this country in the 30-plus years that I have taken an active interest in politics. Indeed, for many of us, the fact that we are constantly governed by representatives of political parties for whom a minority of those casting their votes have voted is an ongoing source of annoyance.

Mr Riddell's assertion that "the first-past-the-post electoral system usually produces a clear result" is a sham when seen in the light of a truly representative electoral system.

I suspect that many who now declare themselves to be profoundly disillusioned by politics and politicians of all persuasions would welcome a system which depended on consensus rather than confrontation for its advancement.

Putting modern buildings on the list

From Mr Hugh McIlveen, FRIBA

Sir, A "thing of beauty" is an entirely subjective assessment, about which even those best qualified to judge may well disagree. Equally, to assert — as does your leading article of November 25, "Bottomley's buildings" — that "ugliness is inherent" in Centre Point, New Zealand House and Millbank Tower is a simplification of overwhelming assumption.

The listing process does not preclude demolition at some future time. It is intended to prevent wholesale and crass alterations to buildings, thus forever obliterating the very qualities which, in the first instance, ranked them as of significant architectural merit.

You refer to Manhattan, Chicago and Hong Kong: but it is vital to recall that these cities do not consist, as London does, of a plethora of architectural history and styles evolved over centuries. The future balance in London may lie somewhere between the 18th and 19th-century buildings which so many admire and those of the much derided later 20th century; but examples of both must remain for posterity to evaluate and judge.

Whereas architectural heritage was once measured in centuries, the last five decades alone have each produced styles of buildings largely dictated by political and market forces and the technology of the time.

Mrs Bottomley is supported at National Heritage by experienced counsel and by sound advice. She has chosen well.

Yours etc,
HUGH McILVEEN,

From the Director of MEPC UK Ltd

Sir, My company owns Centre Point, having acquired the property as part of the Oldham Estate Co, Ltd in 1987.

Since then, we have successfully fully let the building. We have only one floor out of 32 currently vacant, as your report of November 25 makes clear. This is a very low percentage in the current central London office market.

I therefore strongly disagree with your leader's suggestion, in the same issue, that the building "is unusable". Centre Point provides excellent space, and indeed it houses one of our own regional offices. I personally think it is a very fine building, even though I argued against the listing as unnecessary in view of planning protection.

All I hope now is that English Heritage will allow us a flexible approach to the building in the future so that we can carry out modifications and improvements from time to time, to the advantage of users and public alike.

Yours faithfully,
C. G. SHEPPARD,

November 27.

From Colonel Charles H. Wilson

Sir, Your leader advances two criteria for the listing of a building: is it a thing of beauty, and is it an asset to the general landscape? Might there not be a third, which Mrs Bottomley has in mind when preserving Centre Point: that is, as a reflection of the mores of the period?

If the Fleet Prison, where Mr Pickwick whiled away many tortuous hours, had been listed for the third of these reasons, what a mecca it would now be for the lovers of Dickens and all those fascinated by Victorian London — another "Old Curiosity Shop".

Yours faithfully,
CHARLES WILSON,

November 25.

From Mr J. T. Horrocks

Sir, Why should the Department of National Heritage have the right to tell owners and occupiers of premises what they must do with their structures?

The occupants and the neighbourhood are forced to make do with a building which they may not want, and the owner is compelled to maintain at his expense a building which has outlived its usefulness.

The architecture should be judged by the owners, who have after all paid for their buildings, not by the architect, who has a natural inclination to see his work preserved for posterity. Perhaps the rush to demolish recent buildings is a reflection on their quality and design.

Yours faithfully,
J. T. HORROCKS,

Abkhazia repression

From Mr Richard Clogg

Sir, Your letter from the British Helsinki Human Rights Group (November 22) is a timely reminder that it is not only in Nigeria that the lure of oil is distorting Western concern for human rights.

Despite the deplorable human-rights records of the governments of Georgia and Azerbaijan, the leaders of both countries have been fêted on official visits to this country.

During the course of his official visit earlier this year (report, February 17) the Georgian leader, Eduard Shevardnadze, made clear his unqualified support for Russian action against Chechenia and called for the suppression of separatism "regardless of cost and criticism".

It is clear to me that Shevardnadze is hoping to apply Russian methods, or better still have the Russian army do his dirty work for him, in the breakaway region of Abkhazia.

The Abkhazians are currently subject to a ferocious blockade applied by Russia but with the manifest acquiescence of Western countries, including Britain, with oil interests in the region. The Secretary-General of the United Nations has now joined in the chorus of bullying, a clear case of blaming the victim.

The Abkhazians number fewer than 100,000. Were they an animal species there would be an outcry at the prospect of their extinction. Instead we see Western governments mesmerised by the lure of oil riches to match those of the Gulf and prepared to give aid and comfort to regimes whose record on human rights and the treatment of minorities is abysmal.

Russian elections

From Mr Liam Halligan

Sir, Investment and aid inflows into Russia are closely linked to Western perceptions of the domestic political situation. In this regard, may I clarify the statement in the brief analysis of the 1993 parliamentary elections contained in your supplement on the Russian Federation (November 24) that Vladimir Zhirinovsky's neo-fascist party — the oddly named Liberal Democrats — gained 23 per cent of the vote.

The results of the 1993 parliamentary elections are often reported in a manner which does not take account of Russia's mixed majority/proportional-representation system of voting. Half of the 450 seats in Russia's Parliament are allocated according to votes cast for particular parties.

Zhirinovsky's party did indeed win 23 per cent of all party votes, entitling it to 59 seats. However, Russians also vote for constituency candidates. The Liberal Democrats won a mere five constituency seats, while Russia's Choice, the party of the reformer Yegor Gaidar, won 47.

In sum, Russia's Choice gained a total of 87 seats, the largest parliamentary faction by far. The Liberal Democrats, with 64 seats, were second.

An understanding of Russia's voting system will be crucial to the interpretation of the parliamentary elections due to take place on December 17.

Yours faithfully,
LIAM HALLIGAN,
Ul. Chapligina 13/2, Moscow.

Respect for professions

From Mr Aubrey Wilson

Sir, The MORI poll purporting to evaluate the public's respect for the professions (report, November 24) brings to mind the old gibe that if you ask a market researcher, "How is your wife?" he will reply, "Compared to what?".

MORI must be well aware that you can make any profession or institution top or bottom, depending on whom you compare them with. A study which I recall seeing some three years ago included two professions — veterinary surgeons (who command enormous respect) and solicitors (who attract only obloquy) — which are surprisingly omitted by MORI on this occasion. Had they been included, doctors would have dropped in position and MPs risen.

Yours faithfully,
AUBREY WILSON,
6 Lombardy Place, W2.
November 24.

From the Reverend David Barnes

Sir, Since more people are likely to encounter a clergyman during their lifetime than they are an MP, a company director, or even a journalist, why does your MORI popularity league table omit this profession?

Yours sincerely,
DAVID BARNES,
The Vicarage, Queen's Road,
Ash, Canterbury, Kent.
November 24.

From Mr J. Fox

Sir, Magistrates were not included in your poll. Any particular reason?

Yours faithfully,
J. FOX,

Bournemouth, Dorset.

Mr Collins and the Bennet entail

From Mr Peter Rodney

Sir, Professor G. H. Treitel, in a masterly exposé on Pride and Prejudice which appeared in the centenary issue of the Law Quarterly Review (October 1984), suggested two possible explanations for the puzzle raised by Baroness James of Holland Park: "If, in default of a male heir, the Longbourn estate is entailed on Mr Collins, why is his name not Bennet?" [letters, November 18 and 25].

One was that the original creator of the trust had two daughters and settled the estate on the sons (and grandsons, etc) of the elder, and to the sons of the younger in default. The other, more likely, was that one of two branches of a family all having the name Collins changed that name to Bennet on or after succeeding to the Longbourn estate.

To change one's name in this way was common in the 19th century. Edward Austen, Jane's brother, changed his name to Knight on succeeding to the estate of a relation; in Emma, Frank Churchill is Mr Weston's son but has changed his name in expecting to inherit the Churchill estate.

Professor Treitel magisterially concludes:

No elaborate hypotheses are necessary to account for the differences in the surnames of the present holder of the Longbourn estate and of his likely successor.

The professor also answers the question why no steps could be taken to bar the entail. Mr Bennet was probably a tenant for life under a resettlement, with succession to his sons in tail male and, in default of any sons, to the sons of an original settlor some generations back.

If Mr and Mrs Bennet had a son, the son would co-operate in resettling the property. But Mr Collins could not co-operate, since he was only heir presumptive and the law then took the view that Mr Bennet might have a son right up to the moment he died. Only an heir apparent, a son of Mr Bennet, could bar the entail.

Yours faithfully,
PETER RODNEY

November 18.

From Mr D. L. Stewart

Sir, Before the Fines and Recoveries Act of 1833 a tenant of full age in possession of an entailed estate could, by means of a so-called "fictitious action", bar an entail. Has Mr Bennet been enjoying himself in his library rather than reading what was necessary for his family's welfare?

That he should have carried his indolence to the extreme of not bothering to bar the entail just in order to enjoy his wife's complaints may be thought to be carrying his traits of character too far.

Jane and Elizabeth certainly do not seem to know of the possibility of this process when they try to explain the law to their mother, and perhaps Jane Austen herself was unaware of it.

Yours etc,
D. L. STEWART,
Station House,
Heswall Hill, Wirral, Cheshire.
November 18.

From Mr Walter King

Sir, The best-known parallel to the Longbourn entail is that on W. E. Nightingale's property in Hampshire. The heir was his sister's son, William Shore Smith, rather than his own daughters. Florence Nightingale and her sister, Parthenope, were thus disinherited, much as Jane and Elizabeth were.

Distant inheritance is not unusual either. On my own death (having only daughters), all entailed property descending to me under an 18th-century ancestor's will reverts to the male heirs of an 18th-century aunt. A lottery bonanza for them (whoever they may be), were the entailed property not long-since dissipated.

Yours faithfully,
WALTER KING,
1 The Walks East,
Huntingdon, Cambridgeshire.

From Mr John R. Tippetts

Sir, The father or grandfather of Mr Collins was persuaded to change his name from Bennet in order to inherit the fortune of his maternal grandfather.

A similar situation arose in the Tippetts family in 1787, when Josiah Paul Tippetts assumed the surname Paul in accordance with the will of his maternal uncle. It was his son, John Paul Paul, who built Highgrove House in 1796-98, now the home of the Prince of Wales.

The Collins family, however, was less successful and ultimately lost its money, leaving Mr Collins to depend on the benefaction of Lady Catherine de Bourgh.

Yours faithfully,
J. R. TIPPETTS,
Barncroft, Vicarage Lane,
Dore, Sheffield, South Yorkshire.
November 20.

From Mr David Taylor

Sir, Why is Mr Collins not called Bennet? I find the answer obvious: two Mr Bennets in the same novel would have been confusing for the reader.

Yours faithfully,
DAVID TAYLOR,
9 St Paul's Road, Cambridge.

OBITUARIES

SYDNEY BAILEY

Sydney Bailey, writer and pacifist, died on November 26 aged 79. He was born on September 1, 1916.

A SPOKESMAN for peace, Sydney Bailey provided a still, small voice of calm amid the often violent rhetoric of national confrontation. As a Quaker and convinced pacifist, he put his trust in the basic decency of human nature. He believed that if people on one side of a conflict could be induced to see those on the other side as human, then fears and hatreds could be soothed, and negotiations could begin.

His peacekeeping missions took him to the troublespots of the world. He travelled frequently to the Soviet Union at a time when the world was in the grip of the Cold War. He was especially involved in the Middle East, acting as a quiet mediator between Israeli foreign ministers and leaders of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, and he played a behind-the-scenes role in the drawing up of Resolution 242, the key document which, after the 1967 war, formed the foundation of the land-for-peace deal. He also visited South Africa several times before the collapse of apartheid and headed the British Council of Churches delegation to Northern Ireland.

In many ways a shy man, he adopted an understated, almost anonymous role. Unlike some better known negotiators, he never gave a press conference before he left on a mission, preferring to slip discreetly through airports, a seemingly innocuous old man confined to a wheelchair. His job, as he saw it, was to provide an unofficial and essentially private channel of communication between sworn enemies when the demands of nationalistic propaganda and patriotic pride prevented either side from making their negotiations public.

In the 1950s he spent four years as the Quakers' non-governmental representative at United Nations General Assembly meetings. Chatting informally at the bar, he would build up relationships with diplomats of all nationalities and, afterwards, his private rooms would provide a forum for informal debate in which the points of view of differing factions could be exposed and discussed.

He wrote more than 15 books on the subject of peacekeeping, many of which emphasise the importance of the UN in the resolution of international disputes. These books are still often used today as training tools for young diplomats. They have become part of the ongoing process for the promotion of peace in a way which Bailey would have approved. "Peace is a process to engage in, and not a goal to reach," was his conclusion to his last book.

Sydney Dawson Bailey developed his pacifist convictions at an early age. When he was 13 the Bishop of Blackburn came to his school to address the boys. "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's," the bishop intoned, intending to demonstrate that duty to the State was one and the same thing as duty to God. He impressed upon the young boys their responsibility to fight for the British Empire. But Bailey instinctively felt this to be at odds with the pacifist messages of Christianity. "I felt that it couldn't be right for Christ to be a fighter," he later said.

On the outbreak of the Second World War, Bailey registered as a conscientious objector. His family was Methodist, he explained to the tribunal, but he had attended the Congregational Church and was now a pacifist tending towards Quakerism. The tribunal, suspicious of such seeming vagaries, ruled against him. But Bailey appealed, and convinced a second tribunal that his humanitarian beliefs were in earnest when he told them that he had given more than 28 pints of blood.

Bailey served in the Friends' Ambulance Unit in Burma and China during the war. It was here that he contracted the tropical disease bilharzia, although the infection was not diagnosed until many years afterwards, by which time it was too late. His leg, and various of his internal organs, were by then severely damaged and by his fifties he was permanently confined to a wheelchair. It was also in China that Bailey finally joined the Society of Friends.

Returning to London, Bailey worked with those left homeless by the Blitz. He met his wife Brenda, also a Quaker, who was to work with him closely for the rest of his life.

After two years as a bank teller, and a brief spell as an insurance clerk, Bailey began to involve himself full-time as a professional peaceworker. He followed the dictates of a Quaker conscience which told him: "You must try, speak up, at least do something, even if you never see any tangible results."

Among the most important official roles he played were those of Quaker representative to the UN from 1954 to 1958 and visiting scholar of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace from 1958 to 1960.

But his physical handicap concentrated his mind on writing and thought. His first book Ceylon was published in 1952 and he wrote prolifically from then on, his subjects usually a combination of political study and religious conviction. Among his most important works were Prohibitions and Restraints in War (1972), How Wars End (1982), War and Conscience in the Nuclear Age (1987) and The United Nations: A Short Political Guide (1989). His last book, Peace is a Process, was published in 1993.

Sydney Bailey is survived by his wife Brenda, and by their son and daughter.

PRIMROSE BORDIER

Primrose Bordier, French textile designer, died in Paris on November 21 aged 66. She was born there on March 20, 1929.

PRIMROSE BORDIER had a flair for colour. Her main achievement in a thirty-year career as one of France's leading textile designers was to introduce a rainbow brightness into the French home. Drawing her inspiration from the United States and, later, Japan, she persuaded textile manufacturers to diversify away from dominant all-white themes and use coloured and motifed fabrics all over the house, from the dining room to the bathroom. Bordier was the instigator of the fashion for co-ordinated colours.

Later in her career, manufacturers from outside the textile industry — shoemakers, chocolate houses, and even a car factory — came to her for advice on how to brighten the appearance of their products. She also moved into household fragrances, making small boxes of scented ceramics, and inventing a sweet-smelling powder for vacuum cleaners. She was responsible for introducing American-style paper tablecloths, napkins and cups to the French market and she even turned her colour sense to kitchen utensils, lizard-skin ladies shoes and the purple Microcar city vehicle which was launched by the yacht-maker Jeanneau. But her main client was Descamps, the makers of bed linens. As their chief styliste, she made them a household name.

Customers such as Jackie Onassis, Barbra Streisand and Ingrid Bergman promoted Bordier's transatlantic reputation and Descamps opened a boutique for her work in New York. Bordier designs are also found in major department stores all over Britain and in Japan.

Bordier spent five years in the 1950s at a textile design atelier, moving to a velvet manufacturer before completing her training at Boussac, then France's largest textile firm. In the early 1960s she became a household linen designer for the Au Printemps department store in Paris.

Influenced by American fashions for coloured sheets, she ran her own boutique in Paris for a short while, before Au Printemps wooed her back in 1965, offering her a sales space within the store. Opening during the annual Saison du Blanc, devoted traditionally to white linen, Bordier's collection created a sensation. One newspaper heralded her designs as a "revolution in the linen chest".

Her contract with Descamps, signed in 1966, led to franchised stores around France. It ran until 1992 when she launched her own small design company, Couleurs, Desseins et Modèles, along with fellow designer Catherine Braghetti. Shortly before her death, the two women were working on a collection destined for a new market in India.

Bordier's character was as cheerful as her own favourite colours — plum, violet and orange. Her house in the Villa Montmorency, Paris's most exclusive private square, was a blaze of brightness except for the walls which she kept white to offset her modern art collection of works by the surrealist Max Ernst and the abstract painters, Pierre Alechinsky and Serge Poliakoff.

In 1976 Bordier became the first woman designer to be awarded the Légion d'honneur, which she received from the hands of Françoise Giroud, then Ministre de la Condition Féminine and, coincidentally, one of Bordier's leading clients.

Primrose Bordier was the widow of Charles Gombault, former Editor-in-Chief of France Soir. They had no children.

RALPH WHITLOCK

Ralph Whitlock, writer and farmer, died on October 22 aged 81. He was born on February 7, 1914.

RALPH WHITLOCK was the last of the great quartet of modern writers on farming and rural life — which comprised Arthur Street, Ralph Wightman and Rolf Gardiner — and with them he was heir to a tradition of writing which began with William Cobbett and which included W.H. Hudson and Richard Jefferies, Flora Thompson and Edith Olivier.

He owed his gifts of communication to his aptitude for learning and listening: listening to his father's reminiscences of life before the First World War, and learning, first at Bishop Wordsworth's School, Salisbury, and later in the hard school of experience writing as a freelance for local papers.

Whitlock began his writing career by spotting a gap in the market: community news in the local press did not include coverage of his home village of Pitton. He proceeded to make good use of this omission, writing in two, sometimes three, papers each week — to the not inconsiderable benefit of his family's finances. His knowledge of rural life and lore, gained at first-hand, distinguished his weekly columns and by 1932 Whitlock had embarked on a career which was to last more than fifty years, writing the Western Gazette's countryside column.

In 1944 Brian Vesey-Fitzgerald, Editor of The Field, invited Whitlock to submit a series of articles on farming, which led to his tenure as that magazine's farming correspondent from 1946 to 1974. Later he wrote regularly for both The Daily Telegraph and The Manchester Guardian Weekly.

Doubtless, it was this journalistic discipline which gave to Whitlock's writing the grace and fluency that facilitated his prodigious output. He wrote well over a hundred books, excluding new editions of earlier works. There was, indeed, sometimes a direct link between his press pieces and his books. Collections such as Roundbarrow Farm (1946) and Letters from the English Countryside (1992) were amassed from his journalistic cuttings. But in his writing, as in other fields, Whitlock had a gift for bringing his experience in one sphere of activity to bear upon others at first glance quite unrelated.

As a devout Methodist, Whitlock succeeded in many aspects of his life in demonstrating the Parable of the Talents. His radio broadcasts shortly after the war served as his apprenticeship for his BBC Children's Hour series Cowleaze Farm, which ran from 1946 until the end of Children's Hour in 1962, for his Radio 4 series Farming Magazine and for his popular appearances on the panel of Any Questions and on BBC Television's Slightly Quizzical.

In 1968 Whitlock retired from farming and spent the next five years travelling in Africa, the Caribbean and India, as agricultural consultant to the Methodist Missionary Society. Here, again, his talents afforded their return when an Indian blacksmith needed to know how to make a zigzag harrow, or the dowser's fork found water for Ghanaian tribesmen.

His return to England in 1973 allowed Whitlock to continue writing. This yielded the two latter volumes of his great trilogy of life in Pitton: The Lost Village (1988) and A Victorian Village (1990), among many other works. Through his generosity these and much of his professional library is now housed at a named collection in the public library at Salisbury. His last book was published in February of this year: his autobiography was Whitlock's one major outstanding project.

Ralph Whitlock will be remembered also for his role in the establishment of the Bentley Wood Nature Reserve in 1983. This 2,000-acre area of woodland on the Hampshire-Wiltshire border was acquired through a bequest of the late Lady Colman, and Whitlock was both a trustee and honorary warden.

He is survived by his wife, Hilda, two daughters and a son.

FRANK HAMMOND

Frank Hammond, international tennis umpire, died of Lou Gehrig's disease on Staten Island, New York, on November 23 aged 66. He was born in 1929 in Manhattan.

Hammond and Ilie Nastase during their argument in the 1979 US Open Tennis Championships

WHEN professionalism came to the game of lawn tennis, changing it from a fairly genteel sport into a desperate contest for ever-larger sums of money, the players were not the only ones affected. The umpires and linesmen, who for a time remained unpaid volunteers, found their competence increasingly called into question as huge sums of money depended on their decisions. It was time for a change, going beyond the players, and during the 1970s Frank Hammond became the sport's first professional umpire and linesman.

His own decisions had rarely been questioned, ever since he began calling lines at the age of 15. He was so good at it that players would sometimes ask the referee to move a service linesman so that Hammond could take over. By common consent among the players he could control a tennis match better than anyone else, and his reliability was such that he soon found himself in demand for the leading tournaments in England, Italy and Australia, as well as in the United States.

Hammond had another talent that fitted him for the new atmosphere which professionalism brought to the tennis courts. Unlike most officials who tended to be self-effacing, he was a showman whose booming voice and flamboyant style often had the fans seeking his autograph. As a linesman, his nose would almost touch the court as he bent down to make a call.

His judgment failed him only once, but it was a notable lapse. At the 1979 United States Open, umpiring a game between Ilie Nastase and John McEnroe — two of the most dangerous players of the era from an umpire's point of view — he lost control of the match.

It happened after Hammond had disqualified Nastase in the fourth set for causing unreasonable delay, and his subsequent verbal exchanges with the players set off a near-riot in the crowd. Spectators booed for 17 minutes, some ran on to the court and fights began to break out in the stadium. The match was only resumed after Hammond had been overruled by tournament officials and ousted from the chair.

McEnroe, in a notable case of the pot calling the kettle black, later blamed Hammond's style for inciting the crowd to misbehave. Ironically, it was an incident which brought him more fame than all his impeccable decisions.

He is survived by a brother and a sister.

THE ROYAL WEDDING

The Duke of Kent, the fourth son of the King and Queen, and Princess Marina, youngest daughter of Prince and Princess Nicholas of Greece, were married by the Archbishop of Canterbury in Westminster Abbey yesterday.

The Abbey ceremony, which was marked by stately splendour and impressive simplicity, was followed by the wedding service of the Greek Church, rich in symbolic rite, in the private chapel at Buckingham Palace.

Immense crowds assembled to watch the processions from Buckingham Palace to the Abbey and back to the Palace, and the Royal pair were enthusiastically acclaimed.

Cheering crowds also lined the route to Paddington Station in the afternoon, when the Duke and his bride started for Himley, where the first part of the honeymoon is to be spent.

After the solemn pomp of the marriage ceremony and the pageantry of the processions there were popular celebrations at night, and the theatres, cinemas, and restaurants were crowded.

The Service in the Abbey was successfully broadcast by the BBC, and it was clearly heard on the other side of the world ...

A little before a quarter to 11, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishop of London, the Metropolitan Germanos of Thyateira, and the Great Archimandrite Michael Constantinidis, accompanied by the Dean, passed up to their places on the medieval sedilia to the south of the High Altar, where the splendour of their assembled and contrasted vestments gleamed in the candlelight. The Dean then returned to the West Door that he might receive their Majesties. The Duchess of York, the Princess Royal, and the Earl of Harewood meanwhile took their seats in the Presbytery. The Duchess had brought with her the Princess Margaret Rose, who sat upon a stool at her mother's feet and for a little while held her mother's hand until she began to take a sedate and independent interest in her surroundings.

A few minutes later the procession of the King and Queen and their Royal guests passed up the Choir to the music of the first movement of Elgar's Sonata in G. The King sat on the south side of the Presbytery in the chair nearest the Lantern with the Queen on his right and the bride's mother, the Princess Nicholas of Greece, opposite him with a chair at her side left vacant for Prince Nicholas. Between the Queen and the Princess Royal were the King and Queen of Norway. A shorter procession brought in the bridegroom. The three princes all wore naval uniform with the ribbon of the Garter. Having bowed to the King, they took their places on the steps, the Prince of Wales the nearer to the Duke of Kent, with the Duke of York in his support.

A brief pause was ended by the distant singing of Stainer's "Gracious Spirit, Holy Ghost" as the Princess Marina came up from the west. She passed slowly across the Lantern, her head high, her face beautiful, and the more beautiful because a little pale, her carriage very gracious.

The words "I will" were softly spoken and more softly repeated: and the Bride's father, Prince Nicholas of Greece, bowed in answer to the Archbishop's question: "Who giveth this Woman to be married to this Man?" Then, very clearly and audibly, the Duke and the Princess gave their troth to each other, hand in hand, the Princess's bouquet having been passed by the Bridegroom to the Prince of Wales, who, after a moment of hesitation, had laid it on the steps. The Duke turned again to his brother for the ring and, instructed by the Archbishop put it upon the Bride's finger, whereupon they both kneeled, and the Archbishop, joining their hands said: "Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder" ...

ON THIS DAY

November 30, 1934

The marriage of the Duke of Kent and Princess Marina was a brilliant occasion. They were a remarkably handsome couple. Though it was to be a happy marriage it was sadly not a long one. The Duke was killed in an air crash in the Second World War.

Halifax leads mortgage rates lower

BY ROBERT MILLER, JANET BUSH AND COLIN NARBROUGH

THE HALIFAX, Britain's largest mortgage lender, gave the home loans market a much-needed boost yesterday with a surprise post-Budget quarter-point interest rate cut.

Competitors, including Abbey National and Nationwide, followed suit immediately. Others pledged to cut their rate soon.

The move might presage a base rate cut by the Bank of England before Christmas.

The new Halifax standard mortgage rate of 7.74 per cent, which takes effect from January 1, reduces monthly payments on a £30,000 repayment mortgage by £4.07 to £206.45 while the saving on a £50,000 home loan will fall by £7.37 to £352.68. The Abbey said it would cut its rate by 0.2 per cent but said that "unlike Halifax" it had three different rates with discounts for larger loans. Northern Rock cut its rate by 0.4 per cent to 7.59 per cent and said this represented a monthly saving of £17 on a typical £50,000 home loan.

Mike Blackburn, chief executive of the Halifax, which has removed the generous cash-back deals for new borrowers, said: "We want to help existing borrowers and homebuyers. With the housing market poised for an upturn and combined with tax cuts from the Budget this measure will help to encourage a sustained recovery. The current trend for interest rates is downward and we believe that when it is possible to do so, we should pass on lower rates to our customers."

Calls for a cut in base rates has been mountingsince Kenneth Clarke completed his Budget speech on Tuesday.

The FT-SE 100 index built on its impressive recent gains, closing 6.7 points higher at a new record of 3,655.5 and gilts continued to march ahead on hopes that a base rate cut will follow the December 13 meeting between the Chancellor and Eddie George, Governor of the Bank of England.

Adding even more weight to the excitement in the financial markets was a forceful call from the Confederation of British Industry for an immediate half-point reduction in base rates to bolster faltering economic growth.

Sir Bryan Nicholson, the CBI president, said in a statement after the CBI was briefed by the Treasury on the Budget that "conditions are now right for a sustainable reduction in interest rates".

He said the Budget was a responsible one, but that it only provided a "mild stimulus" to the economy. With the favourable inflation outlook, and continued slow growth, the CBI considered the "time is right" for a cut of half a percentage point in interest rates.

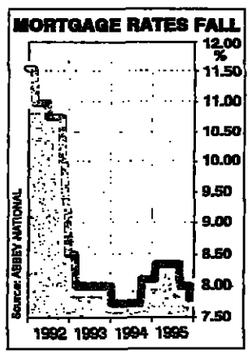

CBI council members welcomed the Halifax cut in its mortgage lending rate as a sign that everybody was starting to move in the "right direction".

But Mr Clarke said yesterday that he was confident that the economy had enough momentum to fulfil his prediction of 3 per cent growth next year without lower base rates. He said that he had agreed to the new, more open framework of monetary policy precisely to free himself and the economy from short-term political pressures and said that, as usual, decisions on rates would be decided with the Governor of the Bank of England at their monthly meetings.

His attempts to play down the prospect of rate cuts had little impact on the euphoria in the markets. A majority in the City believes that the relative tightness of the Budget leaves interest rates as the obvious tool to stimulate the economy. Goldman Sachs, the American investment bank, said that sizeable base rate cuts now seem to be on the way — larger than the markets are currently expecting.

MORTGAGE RATES FALL

Poor are worse off after Budget

BY JANET BUSH, ECONOMICS CORRESPONDENT

THE Chancellor delivered a Budget for Middle and Upper Britain, with the top 10 per cent the biggest gainers by far and the bottom 20 per cent of the population actually worse off after the measures.

The Institute for Fiscal Studies disputed the Government's claim that the average family is £9 a week better off after the Budget, saying that the true figure is £2.20. The Government's figure included an assumption of both inflation and earnings growth next year as well as the Budget's tax changes.

The bottom 10 per cent of the population in terms of income is left 29 pence a week worse off, while the 10 per cent of people above them are 19 pence poorer. Non-smokers in these two brackets fare slightly less badly. In stark contrast, the top 10 per cent of the population has gained £7.30 extra a week from the Chancellor.

Dividing the population into different types of household, a family with two earners but no children comes off best with a gain of £4.32 a week. Next in line is the family with two earners and children which is £3.81 better off. An unemployed couple with children is the biggest loser, with 26 pence less to live on each week.

Pensioners do reasonably well in comparison with other groups, largely because of the change in taxation to their savings income.

The IFS has calculated that 1.5 million pensioners will gain from the taxation changes to savings income, with 750,000 of these being better off by more than £1 a week.

Clarke speech add fuels rebate talk

BY OUR ECONOMICS CORRESPONDENT

SPECULATION revived yesterday that Ian Lang, the President of the Board of Trade, may announce more rebates from the privatised utilities when he opens the Budget debate today.

Electricity customers are set to receive £50 in the new year from the sale of the National Grid, but there have been rumours that the Government has been in secret talks with water and electricity companies in an attempt to persuade them to give a further £150 in cash-back schemes.

The subject has come back on the agenda because of the discovery of a last-minute addition to the text of the Budget speech. The passage, inserted just before the Chancellor told Parliament he would not be imposing a windfall tax on the utilities, said: "I turn now to the utilities. My Right Honourable Friend, the President of the Board of Trade, will speak about the regulatory regime which protects consumers in his speech in the Budget debate on Thursday."

Andrew Dilnot, director of the Institute for Fiscal Studies, speculated yesterday that the Government might still be in negotiations about rebates but that no decision could be struck in time for the Budget.

The Chancellor said yesterday that the Grid rebate in the new year would help to buoy consumer spending.

Treasury and DTI officials declined to comment on yesterday's speculation.

John Layfield this week unveiled measures to protect water supplies costing £75 million

Yorkshire Water lifts profit by half

BY ALASDAIR MURRAY

DROUGHT-HIT Yorkshire Water ran into a storm of criticism yesterday, after the company announced a 50 per cent rise in half-year pre-tax profit to £99.5 million, while two million customers continue to face possible supply cuts.

The company promised an extra £75 million to deal with water shortages in an announcement by John Layfield, director of production and technology, this week. But Yorkshire's critics maintain that it has repeatedly benefited shareholders at the expense of customers. The company announced a further 10 per cent rise in the interim dividend to 9.1p yesterday. The dividend is due on February 26.

Paul Taylor, Ofwat's Yorkshire regional director, said: "The company is in a very healthy position and can easily make the investments necessary to avoid water cuts.

"There have to be questions asked about the quality of the company's management. A better balance should be struck between customers and shareholders."

Trevor Newton, chief executive, defended his company's record through the drought, blaming the freak weather which saw rainfall in the normally wet West Yorkshire region at below 50 per cent of normal levels. He said measures Yorkshire had taken had prevented any cuts in supply, although parts of the region were still under a hosepipe ban and the company still had the power to impose rota cuts.

The £75 million in increased capital expenditure will be used to tackle the supply problems highlighted by the drought, which Yorkshire said had so far added an extra £20 million to operating costs.

The company also said Malcolm Batty, finance director, was stepping down, to be succeeded by Brian Wilson, formerly of Norweb.

Trust will fund nuclear clean-up

BY ROSS TIERMAN, INDUSTRIAL CORRESPONDENT

A TRUST company is to be set up in Scotland to fund the decommissioning of Britain's modern nuclear stations when they are privatised next summer, Tim Eggar, Energy Minister, said.

The company will receive funds from British Energy, the nuclear operator to be privatised in a £2.6 billion flotation. The trust company will collect funds and pay out when decommissioning work is done. Liabilities of British Energy and Magnox Electric, its sister company, which is to stay in the public sector, are thought to total £8.6 billion.

Creation of the trust fund will defuse one of the toughest issues of the nuclear sale. Concern over open-ended liabilities for spent plants and fuel scuppered a previous attempt by ministers to sell the nuclear power industry in 1989.

In evidence to the cross-party Parliamentary Trade and Industry Select Committee, Mr Eggar said: "The funding company will be owned by an independent trust, and will enter into a contract with the privatised companies under which it will receive funds, invest them and make payments from the invested funds to meet long-term de-commissioning costs. The arrangements will come into effect on privatisation next summer".

Mr Eggar said the fund would cover the liabilities of the seven advanced gas-cooled reactors and the one pressurised-water reactor owned by Nuclear Electric and Scottish Nuclear. Mr Eggar said the Scottish trust company would be advised by independent actuaries on the sums of money needed now to meet liabilities decades, or centuries ahead. In studies to date, the Government has used the 25-year gilts yield as a benchmark suggesting a discount rate of 3.5 per cent was appropriate.

C&G in mis-selling settlement

BY ROBERT MILLER

CHELTENHAM & GLOUCESTER, now part of Lloyds Bank, has made a £2 million settlement with some of the elderly victims who were mis-sold home income plans.

C&G still faces a separate multimillion-pound legal action by hundreds more investors. This is being co-ordinated by the Investors Compensation Scheme, the official safety net for investors who lose money through bad advice, theft or fraud, over home income plans sold by Aylesbury Associates, a failed firm of independent financial advisers. The ICS has paid out more than £6 million in compensation to 279 former Aylesbury investors and is now looking to recoup that money through the courts.

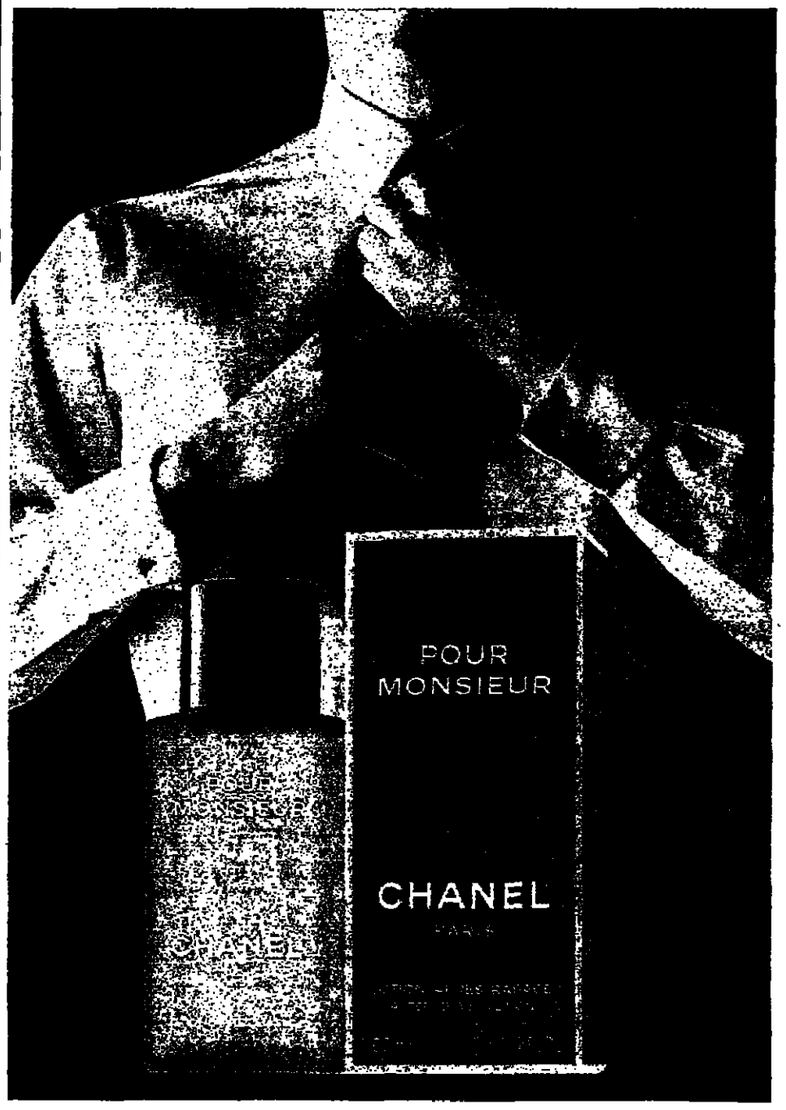

Earlier this month, the ICS was given the go-ahead in the High Court to pursue C&G. The retail mortgage lending arm of Lloyds Bank was given until December 12 to lodge an appeal but said last night that no decision had yet been made.

C&G admits that it provided the mortgage funding for the Aylesbury plans, which were linked to stock market bonds and have since been banned by the regulators, but has consistently denied it was responsible for selling them.

The precise nature of yesterday's surprise settlement, which involves 27 investors who took separate legal action and who by-passed the ICS in favour of using the courts, was being kept confidential between C&G and Harrison Clark, the Worcester law firm representing the investors. It is understood that C&G will pay the investors' legal costs of almost £1 million as well as agreeing to waive the interest on outstanding loans, which until the settlement, was calculated on a daily basis. The average loan was between £35,000 and £40,000 and could cost at least another £1 million in lost interest.

The investors have been assured that they can remain in their homes for the rest of their lives. Where there is an outstanding debt on the property, however, C&G has the right to recover that money from the estate of the late owners.

The ICS has also issued writs against nine other building societies, including West Bromwich, National Counties and Bristol & West, over the discredited home income plans. The compensation scheme has paid out more than £45 million to 2,500 elderly plan investors.

OECD approves US line

BY JANET BUSH
ECONOMICS CORRESPONDENT

THE risks of either a recession or a renewed boom in the American economy are low and a cautious stance on interest rates is advisable, according to the latest report on the US by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).

In a broadly favourable review of US developments, it applauds the interest rate policy of the US Federal Reserve as well as the political consensus in favour of balancing the budget.

However, the OECD says that there is a danger that further reductions in short-term interest rates might prove inappropriate and could need to be quickly reversed.

It believes that the economy has achieved a soft landing and that the recovery will now enter into its fifth year with no major macro-economic problems. Growth in 1996 is expected to be around 2.5 per cent and underlying inflation stable.

Liquidation of Lloyd's 'not answer for names'

BY SARAH BAGNALL

RON SANDLER, the new chief executive of Lloyd's of London, said yesterday that putting it into liquidation would not be a panacea for names' problems.

In response to assertions by a membership group that some names would be better off if the insurance market ceased trading, Lloyd's has sent out a document analysing the implications of such a move.

In a letter to members' agents, Mr Sandler said that the memorandum "sets out very clearly why we [the Council of Lloyd's] believe that insolvency or some form of managed run-off is not an attractive option for names". The document, Reconstruction and Renewal: Implications of Run-Off, states that the council is convinced that run-off would inflict severe damage on names and they would not be able to avoid their liabilities.

It claims that it is wrong to think that the mechanism for collecting money would break down or that Lloyd's, or other regulators, would lack the resolve or the determination to ensure that names met their obligations in full.

Lloyd's sought confirmation from the Department of Trade and Industry that policyholders' rights would be the first priority if the ministry exercised its powers of intervention. Those include powers to require all names to maintain sufficient assets in trust to meet all their obligations.

A further conclusion of the document is that names' losses are likely to escalate and demands for payment accelerate. This is because the council predicts a rush by policyholders to secure their claims that would be likely to cause syndicates without the funds to defend actions by claimants.

The council also argues that there would be a spiral of defaulting reinsurance recoveries across the market, which would escalate names' losses as syndicates were unable to collect from syndicates with which they had reinsured.

Lloyd's argues that no alternative to the reconstruction and renewal programme, which includes a £2.8 billion settlement package, has been suggested. However, Christopher Stockwell, chairman of the Lloyd's Names Associations' Working Party, revealed that it would be publishing a serious discussion paper on Monday on the impact of putting Lloyd's into run-off.

The action group claims that the paper will "present the case for an orderly run-off as a viable alternative to reconstruction and renewal with" a view to providing names will all the facts necessary to make an objective choice".

Tate & Lyle looks abroad

BY CHRISTINE BUCKLEY

THE world's biggest sugar company is continuing its push overseas and last year spent £116 million expanding its global interests.

Tate & Lyle — which this week announced a boardroom shake-up in which Sir Neil Shaw, the group's chief executive and chairman, is to abandon his executive duties — is focusing its efforts largely on the emerging markets. There it hopes to serve the demand for healthier lifestyles with its food processing and sweeteners.

The company has targeted its resources on cane mills in China, Mexico and Zambia in the year to September 30. Subsequently, it has taken a majority stake in a refinery in the Ukraine.

Sir Neil Shaw, the chairman who is shifting towards retirement in two years' time with a gradual easing of his responsibilities, said: "Demand for sugar and food ingredients is growing substantially faster in these markets than in the more developed markets in which the group's assets are primarily deployed."

Tate is aiming to secure about a quarter of its operating profits from developing markets in the short term, and is looking to compensate for flat margins in Europe with accelerating ones elsewhere in the world.

The company, which recently switched its political support to the Labour Party, produced pre-tax profits at the upper end of expectations with improving contributions from its US starch and sugar businesses.

Although Tate warned of pressure on prices in the North American market, the US sweeteners and starch business contributed £170.9 million in the period, up from £147.6 million previously. Europe mustered £144.3 million compared with £136.5 million.

Pre-tax profits for the year rose 13.6 per cent to £311.1 million. The final dividend, payable February 6, was set at 11p. This brings the total to 16p, a rise of 11 per cent on the previous year.

BUSINESS ROUNDUP

UK urged to buy European weapons

A KEY report, calling for the Government to adopt a more pro-European strategy for buying weapons has been approved after more than a month of wrangling by members of two cross-party select committees. The first draft of the report from a joint enquiry by the Commons Trade and Industry and Defence select committees was blocked by some Conservative right-wingers last month. But a compromise has now been struck and the committee is set to publish its findings within a fortnight.

The Government has become highly sensitive to criticism of its failure to back British defence manufacturers in the face of rapid consolidation of the defence industry in America. Dick Evans, chief executive of British Aerospace, said at the annual conference of the Confederation of British Industry that governments must pursue collective procurement policies if Europe's arms makers are to remain competitive.

Mortgage challenge

BUILDING societies are set to lose their traditional dominance of the mortgage market to banks, according to one of the world's leading credit rating agencies. In a special report on the financial creditworthiness of UK building societies, Standard & Poor's says that this summer's £1.8 billion takeover of Cheltenham & Gloucester by Lloyds Bank and the proposed £1.4 billion acquisition of National & Provincial by Abbey National will lift the banks' share of the £350 billion mortgage market to 38 per cent compared with just 5.5 per cent in 1980.

Lang plea on contracts

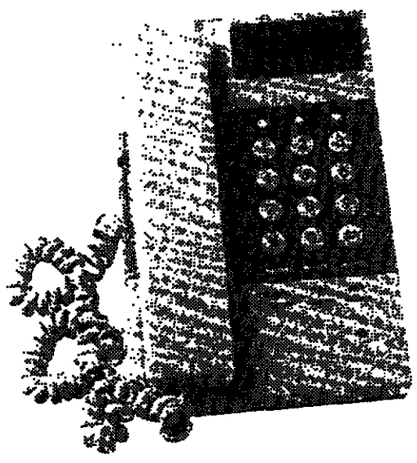

IAN LANG, the President of the Board of Trade, told companies yesterday to avoid long-notice contracts for directors but rejected demands that shareholders' approval should be sought for contracts of more than 12 months. Mr Lang conceded that there were "payment for failure" cases in which directors had received "large pay-offs when unsatisfactory performance has prompted early termination of their contracts". He said that reducing the length of notice would help cut costs to companies and shareholders and said that notice should generally be restricted to 12 months.

WTO panel chosen

THE World Trade Organisation, the free trade watchdog, has finally chosen the panel of experts, officially called the Appellate Body, to be final arbiters in international trade disputes. Chosen after protracted argument, they are James Bacchus, the former US congressman, Klaus-Dieter Ehrlermann, a German trade lawyer, Mitsuo Matsushita, a Japanese academic, Christopher Beeby, a New Zealand trade diplomat, Florentino Feliciano, a Philippine supreme court judge, Said el-Naggar, an Egyptian academic, and Julio Lacarte Muro, a Uruguayan trade diplomat.

TSB merger approval

SHAREHOLDERS at TSB's extraordinary meeting in Glasgow yesterday approved the bank's planned takeover by Lloyds Bank. As well as approving the merger, they authorised their directors to enable participants in Lloyds's share option scheme to be granted options over new Lloyds TSB shares, and approved the name change. Lloyds's shareholders approved the £13.6 billion deal on Monday. The two will next seek High Court approval for a scheme of arrangement to enable the reverse takeover of TSB by Lloyds to take place. The hearing is on December 18.

☐ Mortgage lenders pre-empt the markets ☐ Names warned of pain of Lloyd's collapse ☐ Ministers take stick to jobless

Quick to the cut

☐ WHAT a vibrant, fast-moving business mortage lending now is. The fusty old days of caution and sobriety have been swapped for a giddy bidding round that would not shame a lively afternoon in the Liffe pits.

Consider the excitement yesterday afternoon. Once the market had absorbed the implications of Tuesday's Budget, interest rate cuts that were already widely expected looked a racing certainty.

In the bad old days of boring building societies, the latter would have waited for the proper announcement of a base rate cut through the usual channels before reducing their own rates. One or two old fuddy-duddies, bless them, might even have delayed a couple of days, to see if the new rate was going to stick.

By 10am yesterday the Halifax, the biggest mortage lender and determined to stay that way, had responded to market rumours of an imminent rate cut by announcing "no immediate plans" for such a move. This, as any spiv in the market knows, is a cunning code for "expect cuts immediately," and the quarter-point reduction was duly announced at 2pm.

Within 20 minutes, the Nationwide and the Abbey National had the situation under review, and their own cuts were duly announced over the next two hours. The rush to reduce rates had been encouraged by the Budget itself, which by trimming the rate of tax paid by the country's 14 million savers had managed to widen the effective margin between lending and borrowing rates.

But wait. It is a compelling irony that this pre-emptive strike by the mortgage lenders may even militate against a move from the Chancellor. If the private sector is prepared to act alone in trying to kick-start the housing market, why should the Government agonise too much about leading base rates lower?

Here are two counter-arguments to assumptions of a cut after the December 13 meeting between Chancellor and Bank. First, sterling has slumped to record lows since the Budget and the Bank will be uncomfortable about that.

Second, Kenneth Clarke has pencilled in an optimistic assumption of 3 per cent growth for next year, based on growing consumer confidence. This is above any estimate of Britain's long-range sustainable growth rate, so the Chancellor could be taking a risk on inflation by cutting rates. He also claimed yesterday that the economy is well placed to push ahead with rates where they are.

Perhaps this was just natural optimism after a Budget universally acknowledged to be dull. If the markets are discounting lower base rates, why shouldn't the Chancellor give himself a little cost-free dividend for his caution? Over and above that, Mr Clarke is probably vastly overestimating the economy's ability to bounce back. Lower rates would therefore prove necessary — to the relief of the big mortgage lenders.

Sibling rivalry at Lloyd's

☐ LLOYD'S of London has long resembled a dysfunctional family, and the recent divorce of the parents, Peter Middleton and David Rowland, has sent tremors through the multitude of squabbling children and grandchildren. Relations between the various factions that make up the extended family are strained in the extreme. Rowland and his new partner, Ron Sandler, are working hard at trying to pull all the names together in the face of adversity, but the family rebels are pulling equally hard in the opposite direction.

Just as parents make mistakes, there is no denying that Lloyd's has made mistakes too — serious and costly ones at that. The question is whether the pain inflicted on names rules out the chances of a happy reconciliation.

A major problem that Lloyd's faces is the breakdown of trust. Constantly telling your children that you will bring them home a big present, only to disappoint them again and again, can only lead to tears before bedtime. Past experience has wiped out much of the goodwill that existed, leaving many names sceptical.

Yesterday's letter from Lloyd's ruling council concluded, with the help of its lawyers Freshfields, that allowing Lloyd's to fail and putting it into run-off would not ease the names' pain. Instead, the market's death throes would inflict even more agony on them, and there would be little chance of their escaping from the burden of meeting their losses. Lloyd's argues that the probable result would be that names' debts would increase and the demands for payment of these increased debts would be speeded up.

All this may be true, but Lloyd's has little chance of swaying the minds of those family members who believe its management will say anything to dig itself out of a hole. Much rests on Slaughter & May, the lawyers hired to check independently the council's findings. If they agree with the council's conclusions, the rebels may opt to back Lloyd's plans. Even if they disagree, it is unlikely that those conclusions will ever be put to the test — unless the number of rebels swells sufficiently to outweigh those family members who support the actions of their parents.

Victorian values

☐ AS VICTORIAN mill-owners or the cotton plantation managers of the Deep South knew, people work for two reasons, the carrot or the stick, but the stick is cheaper. It has one advantage over the carrot, in that it can be used again and again rather than consumed at once by an ungrateful recipient.

The stick in those days, in the form of starvation or physical chastisement, was also rather stouter than would be allowed today, so the carrot was never much needed.

But as an instrument of government employment policy, the stick has a mixed record in this country at least. In the 1930s, the means test, of bitter memory, required thousands who would today have qualified for benefit to live on the charity of sometimes distant relatives.

The carrot has never been much use either in moving the long-term unemployed, accustomed to life on the dole, back into the workforce. So the new Workfare, sorry, Project Work programme to be tested from next year represents the most widespread use for decades of the stick. The Government proposes to bar anyone unemployed for two years and not prepared to present themselves physically for work from claiming benefit.

It might have worked at the mill or on the plantation. But those long-term unemployed who genuinely want to work again do not need the encouragement of the stick. By contrast, those who would prefer to stay idle can no longer be physically coerced back into a real job.

Joint account

☐ ONE person in ten in the City takes recreational drugs — about normal, one would suppose, for any workforce with a higher than average share of the young and affluent. It seems a little low, to judge from anecdotal evidence. The good news is that the coke-sniffing yuppie dealing in millions while totally wired is a myth. As in other walks of life, most City druggies prefer cannabis, taken out of hours, in private, and therefore cause little harm to their employers.

Argyll keeps Safeway ahead in price wars

By Sarah Bagnall

ARGYLL, the supermarket group, yesterday revealed that a costly price war has flared up between the big four food retailers over the lucrative run-up to Christmas.

Colin Smith, chief executive, said: "Recently, key products, such as fruit and vegetables and petrol, have been experiencing intense pricing pressure and we have taken firm action to ensure Safeway remains fully competitive."

Prices of seven key products — bananas, loose carrots and onions, iceberg lettuce, cauliflowers, loose tomatoes and new potatoes — have fallen significantly in the past six weeks. In the case of bananas prices have tumbled from about 40p to 19p a pound as Tesco cut prices to match those charged by Asda. This prompted Sainsbury and Safeway to follow suit, which in turn caused Asda to cut its prices further. Mr Smith said he did not expect any more movement between now and Christmas.

Mr Smith made his remarks as he unveiled a 5 per cent rise in pre-tax profits to £215 million in the 28 weeks to October 14. The result was towards the top end of analysts' forecasts and the shares rose 7p to 312p. The advance was achieved on the back of a 1 per cent rise in sales to £3.4 billion but excluding businesses sold during the past year. Sales rose 11 per cent. Safeway sales rose 13 per cent to £3.1 billion, while Presto sales fell 11 per cent.

The City was pleased with the healthy advance in Safeway's like-for-like sales of 7.8 per cent, which helped Argyll to lift its market share by 0.2 per cent to 7.5 per cent. Continuing the trend of improving underlying sales, Mr Smith revealed that in the first six weeks of the second half, like-for-like sales at Safeway were 9.6 per cent higher.

Mr Smith warned that the unexpected pricing pressure on the key product areas meant that gross margins in the second half would be a little below those of last year. In the first half the gross margin slipped by 0.5 per cent.

The group said about three million customers had signed up for its ABC loyalty card, which was launched nationally last month.

The dividend, due February 19, was lifted from 3.9p to 4.05p, in line with the rise in earnings per share from 12.8p to 13.3p.

Littlewoods partial float recommended

THE debate over the future ownership of Littlewoods took a further step towards resolution yesterday when shareholders of the privately owned company were advised of their options (Sarah Bagnall writes).

After a review of the options over the last five months, Michael Gatenby, a former director of Charterhouse bank, recommended that in a few years time the family should consider a partial flotation.

Most of the 32 members of the Moores family that owns the retailing and football pools company gathered at a two-day meeting at a London hotel.

The review was commissioned in May, before the emergence of a "possible" £1.2 billion offer by Barry Dale, who was ousted as chief executive last year.

Welsh Water to resume bid talks with Swalec

By Christine Buckley

WELSH WATER returns to bid talks today with South Wales Electricity (Swalec) after being pressed yesterday to raise its offer when negotiations broke down after only half an hour.

The meeting, which has been stalled on several occasions by the water company, was abandoned after a bid of between 825p and 840p was tabled.

Andrew Walker, chief executive of Swalec, said: "We are looking for a price well north of £9 and we will talk further once they are prepared to come up with that."

The talks at the offices of NM Rothschild, one of the banks that is advising Swalec, hit the price obstacle when the Welsh Water representatives switched to a another room for talks among themselves. After three hours, they asked for a further meeting with Swalec, but the company declined ahead of preparation for publication of its interim results. It has brought the figures forward to this morning, just under a week ahead of schedule.

The companies are scheduled to resume talks this afternoon after interim presentations. Welsh Water, which was forced to show its hand over Swalec by the Stock Exchange after a leap in the electricity company's share price, has delayed talks for a variety of reasons over the past few weeks.

First, it wanted more time to consider its offer. Then, it said that it needed to gauge the value of the National Grid shares that began trading in the grey market last week. Then it stalled again, arguing that it wanted to see if the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going to impose any restrictions on the utilities in the Budget.

All regional electricity companies own a proportion of the National Grid, which is to be floated on December 11.

Yesterday, Welsh Water would not comment further on the talks. Swalec said that its interim figures would help to demonstrate that greater value was held in the electricity company than the prices so far offered by Welsh would indicate.

At the outset of negotiations between the two companies, it was thought that a rival bidder, such as an American utility, might enter the contest, but that is not now believed to be the case.

Committee to consider future of the Savoy

By Eric Reguly

SAVOY HOTEL yesterday appointed a directors' committee to consider the group's future now that Forte, its biggest shareholder, is under takeover threat from Granada.

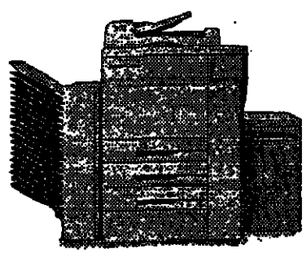

Granada last week offered £3.4 billion in shares and cash for Forte, Britain's largest hotels and restaurants operator, and said it would sell Forte's 68 per cent equity interest in the Savoy if the bid succeeds. Gerry Robinson, Granada's chief executive, called the Savoy a "trophy" asset that produces more glamour than earnings.

The market values Savoy at about £300 million but the true worth of the Forte stake is questionable because it comes with only 42 per cent voting interest. The Wontner family and its charitable trusts control the rest of the voting shares and have been able to prevent an outright takeover by Forte.

The six-person committee, led by Sir Ewen Fergusson, the Savoy chairman, is being advised by Barings. Sir Rocco Forte and Sir Anthony Tennant, who are Forte's representatives on the Savoy board, are not on the committee.

Separately, Mr Robinson and other Granada executives today begin visiting institutional investors to try to convince them to back the bid.

Shares confound sceptics with another new high

THE equity market extended its record-breaking run, confounding many experts who had given the Chancellor's Budget package a cool reception.

But it was a strong overnight rally on Wall Street which signalled the early mark-up. The FT-SE 100 index hit a new all-time trading peak of 3,671.0, but saw its earlier lead whittled away, despite news of a cut in the Halifax Building Society's mortgage rate and talk of an early cut in bank base rates. However the index still ended 6.7 points up at a new closing high of 3,655.5. A total of 782 million shares were traded.

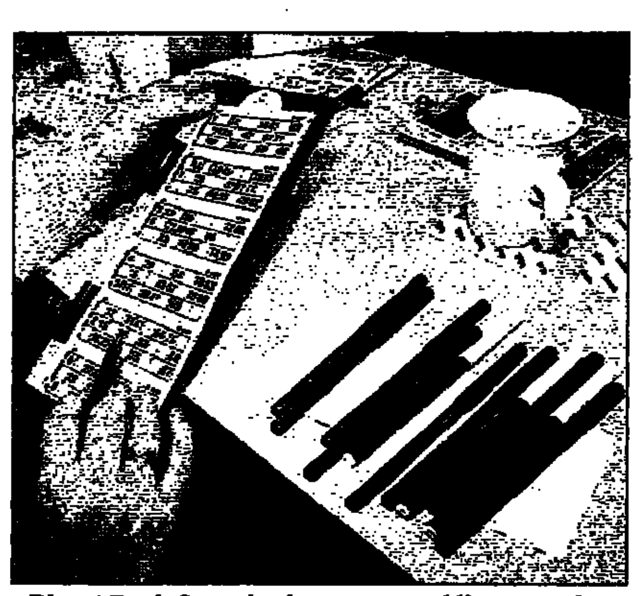

Dealers said there was little Budget follow-through. Drinks companies which should have benefited from the duty freeze on beer and wine and the cut in spirits duty, failed to respond. Allied Domecq finished 6p down at 504p, Grand Metropolitan 5p cheaper at 434p and Guinness 10p down at 459p.

Some of the best gains relating to the Budget were recorded among banks, with brokers anticipating a series of interest rate cuts to revive the economy and, in particular, kick-start the depressed housing market. Abbey National led the way higher with a rise of 17p to 635p as news of the Halifax cut filtered through.

There was heavy turnover in shares of Standard Chartered, with the price climbing back above £6 at one stage before settling 16p higher at 596p amid talk of buying from the Far East. City whispers suggest a bid from Credit Suisse, the Swiss banking giant. By the close yesterday, more than 5 million shares had changed hands. Other banks to go better included, HSBC, 18p to 968p, Lloyds, 7p to 877p, and National Westminster, 3p to 675p. Royal Bank of Scotland rose 11½p to 547p before figures later today.

Goldman Sachs, the US securities house, is believed to be behind a 10p rise to 416p in Rank Organisation. The bingo-to-holiday camps group is due to issue a trading update on December 6 which should make positive reading. Business at Rank Xerox, where it continues to have a holding, is said to be "booming".

Vodafone, the cellular network operator, rose 5p to 223½p as the company and a party of brokers arrived in Greece on a tour of the group's overseas operations. Other venues are said to include South Africa and Australia.

Bingo! Rank Organisation was a good line yesterday

British Aerospace continue to be chased higher, reflecting its investment in Orange, the cellular network operator, which it owns with Hutchison Whampoa. Brokers calculate Orange could be worth 100p a share to BAe whose shares finished 19p better at 820p and have risen more than 100p since November 9.

Capital Radio, the independent radio broadcaster, leapt 29p to 504p after a buy recommendation from Merrill Lynch. A line of 900,000 shares were crossed at 505p, reminding brokers that news should be due soon on proposals for cross-media ownership.

The battle lines continue to be drawn between South Wales Electricity, up 21p at £10.98, and Welsh Water after the latter signalled its intention to make a full bid. Welsh Water says it is prepared to offer terms valuing Swalec at 825p-840p a share, with a full cash alternative. The news emerged after a meeting between the two companies at which the terms, which exclude the National Grid and Swalec's interim dividend, were tabled. They were immediately rejected by Swalec as inadequate. Welsh Water finished 2p easier at 696p.

Drought-stricken Yorkshire Water came in for some adverse comment after reporting interim figures near the top end of expectations, with pre-tax profits 10 per cent ahead at £101.5 million. This had been achieved despite the drought adding an extra £20 million to operating costs, while the exceptional burden of maintaining water supplies cost £4.6 million. The payout was lifted almost 10 per cent to 9.1p.

Full-year figures from Tate and Lyle received a warm welcome, with the shares adding 10p to 454p. Pre-tax profits jumped from £274 million to £311 million with Sir Neil Shaw, chairman, telling brokers that T&L's core businesses were in better shape than they had ever been. He picked out the North American sugar operations and emerging markets as areas offering particularly strong growth.

There was also a positive response to half-year figures from Argyll, the Safeway supermarket group, which were at the top end of expectations. Pre-tax profits were £10 million higher at £215 million after raising like-for-like sales at Safeway by almost 8 per cent despite a major restructuring. Argyll is Britain's third biggest supermarket chain behind Tesco, 1p easier at 286p, and J Sainsbury, 2p better at 382p. Argyll responded with a rise of 7p to 312p.

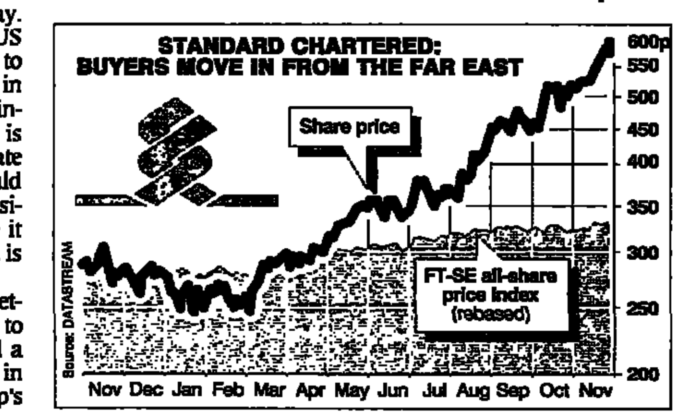

Queensborough Holdings, the leisure company, began trading on the big board yesterday after moving up from the USM following a reorganisation. The shares started life at 29p and briefly touched 30p before settling at 29p. It was also the first day of dealings for L Gardner Group, the engineer. Placed at 125p, the shares started life at 125½p before closing at their best of the day at 146p.

□ GILT-EDGED: There was a steepening of the yield curve with shorts underpinned by the prospect of an early cut in interest rates, while longer dated issues were worried by the upward revision of the PSBR forecast. Prices opened firmer but closed below their best. The December long gilt rose £¼ to finish at £109²³/₃₂ as a total of 75,000 contracts were completed.

Index-linked issues rose by £⅛ on average, while among conventional issues Treasury 8 per cent 2013 hardened £¹/₁₆ to £101²³/₃₂. In shorts, Treasury 8 per cent 2000 rose £¼ to £104⅜.

□ NEW YORK: Shares opened higher on Wall Street, extending Tuesday's late rally. At midday the Dow Jones industrial average was 1.81 points higher at 5,079.91.

Keep an eye on Dixons. There was heavy trading in the shares yesterday with more than 13 million changing hands as the price tumbled 11p to 408p. Brokers reported a line of more than 2 million shares being sold at 403p, a sharp discount to the then ruling price of 418p. They were later sold on at 404½p.

Our value for your money

CRUNCHING numbers is a job normally done by accountants, but when numbers get very big — and very unreliable — accountants are replaced by economists. It is that process that is now allowing the Government to forge ahead with the Private Finance Initiative: a cute scheme to shift the burden of government capital spending from present to future generations by transferring risk to the private sector in exchange for paying rent.

Key to the success of a PFI project is its value for money (VFM) but so far contractors have complained bitterly that the bidding process is too expensive, too bureaucratic and the returns too meagre to justify taking part. Undeterred, the Chancellor predicts some £14 billion of contracts will be agreed by 1998/9 and, acknowledging government shortcomings, Price Waterhouse has been hired to train some 10,000 civil servants in the black art of design, build and operate contracts.

In large part, the problem has been one of pricing risk. According to the Treasury, VFM is determined by measuring the net present value of future payments to the private sector against the equivalent cost of government DIY. However, a government department's cost of capital is 6 per cent compared with double digits for the private sector. If PFI can save the taxpayer money, either the private sector is very efficient or the Civil Service hopelessly incompetent at managing projects.

The retraining programme suggests the latter, but the suspicion lingers that VFM is not just about counting beans. PFI contracts are bespoke and with a determined Chancellor backing PFI, value for money could mean something very different indeed.

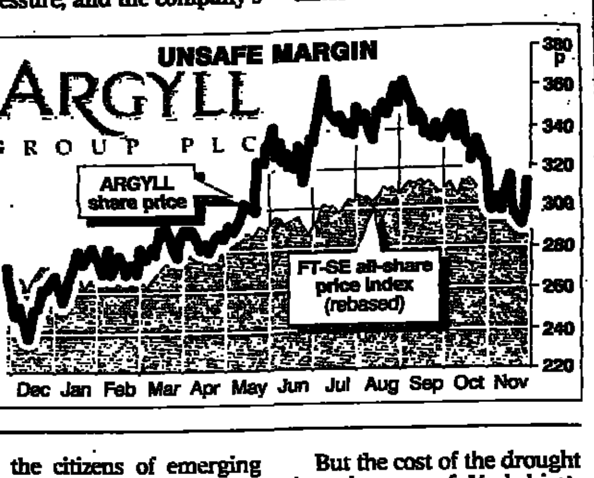

Argyll

ARGYLL'S strategy of chasing sales and cutting costs is delivering short-term results, but the gain in market share may not compensate for the erosion of margin. The like-for-like sales advance of 7.8 per cent in the first half is a marked improvement to the 1 per cent decline in the first quarter of the last financial year. In each of the last six quarters, underlying sales growth has been ahead of the improvement in the previous period, and the trend is continuing. Like-for-like sales rose 9.6 per cent in the first six weeks of the second half, a stark contrast to Sainsbury's lacklustre performance.

Food retailing remains fiercely competitive, and while Argyll is notching up pleasing revenue gains, investors may find better bargains elsewhere. Argyll's sales per square foot are up £1 to £14 — matching those of Asda, but still falling short of both Tesco and Sainsbury.

Having lowered prices in the pursuit of volume, Argyll might have hoped to begin to consolidate its gains in the second half, but food retail margins are again under pressure, and the company's warning about gross margin slippage is no surprise.

Argyll enjoys better margins than Asda, but this only enhances the attractions of the latter which has room for improvement, an opportunity reflected in Asda's shares which trade on a prospective multiple of 15 times compared with Argyll's 12.5 times.

Tate & Lyle

THERE was a time, not very long ago, when the world's largest sugar company looked fat from over indulgence. A worldwide sugar surplus, overweening global ambitions and an American business beset by labour and pricing problems, led some to the conclusion that Tate & Lyle needed a crash diet and a spell in a health farm.

Times have changed and Tate & Lyle is now proving to be a leaner and trimmer beast than expected. Yesterday's figures were ahead of forecasts and improvements in Staley, the US operation, look convincing.

Tate has committed itself to a high level of investment.

In the past year it has spent £211 million on new plant and machinery and has allocated a further £116 million for developing overseas operations. Growth there is expected to flourish as the citizens of emerging markets acquire a taste for fast food and sweeteners to match their new, frenetic Western lifestyles.

Tate is hoping that margin improvement in the developing regions will compensate for flatter returns in Europe and is anticipating that about a quarter of its operating profit will come from new markets in the short term. Unless commodity prices upset its plans, Tate is capable of turning in good profits.

Yorkshire Water

THE directors of Yorkshire Water might consider a rain dance. The bill for maintaining supplies through the drought is now running at £3 million a week and although the company has weathered this to date, it must soon begin to affect profits. The £75 million of precautionary measures announced yesterday has come too late to solve the short term supply problems.

But the cost of the drought is only part of Yorkshire's current predicament. Hosepipe bans have focused attention on the conflicting demands of water customers and shareholders. Long term problems such as Yorkshire's poor leakage record, a legacy of the appalling infrastructure the company inherited at privatisation, are now on the agenda. Remedying the situation is highly expensive, but public opinion is forcing Yorkshire to put the customer first.

Sir Gordon Jones, the chairman, came close to admitting yesterday that the interim dividend increase was only possible because of the sale of the company's Yorkshire Cable investment. Yorkshire wants to maintain a dividend growth rate of just under 10 per cent for the next five years, but unless rain dowses the fire of public opinion it may find its priorities lie elsewhere.

CITY DIARY

Hotline on deadline

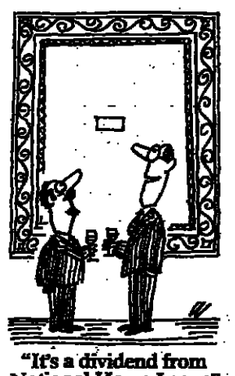

MY HEART goes out to PHH, the vehicle management services group, which set up a special Budget Hotline on 01793-885015 and then sat there waiting for the phone to ring. When I tried the number several times on Tuesday, I could not get through. On checking the number with BT, I was informed: "It's a spare line, but without a subscriber". Meanwhile, PHH's team of five experts sat in a room waiting for the phone to ring. They waited and waited and waited. "There was a technical fault at our end," a voice which sounded obviously relieved to talk to somebody echoed from an empty room yesterday, "it did ring once ... but it was a wrong number".

Switched off

A WONDERFULLY Irish tax avoidance scheme has been cruelly curtailed by the Budget. Drivers from Northern Ireland had been crossing the border into the Republic to fill up with cheap gas oil — intended for agricultural use — and driving back again to show a considerable saving on their motoring costs — as red diesel has 2.33p/litre duty against 34.3p/litre for ordinary diesel. HM Customs and Excise were powerless to stop them because of an EU agreement under which diesel imported in fuel tanks was exempt from duty. This loophole has now been closed, much to the disappointment of a band of entrepreneurs who had set up filling stations the length of the border.

Tasty spread

IT WAS NOT only whisky drinkers who benefited from the Budget. The Chancellor took only 68 minutes to deliver his speech which means the hordes who placed spread bets with City Index and Sporting Index have been raking it in. The spread at City Index was 83-87 minutes, and at Sporting Index 82-86 minutes. Sporting Index admits "we were off-track", and graciously sends congratulations to all the winners.

"It's a dividend from National Home Loans"

On the scent

A MOST appropriate suggestion to name a British Airways perfume comes from a very well qualified lady, who once worked as ground staff for Iceland Air. Hafdis Bennett of Wembley was given a one-hour free flying lesson by her family one Christmas, became hooked, took lessons — and qualified as a private plot to fly single engine aircraft at the tender age of 50! She says: "Take it from a lady passionate about flying. The name of the BA fragrance just has to be — Soaring".

Body politic

PADDY ASHDOWN, fielding questions at a German-British Chamber of Industry and Commerce lunch at the Dorchester, said he liked to think of Labour and the Conservatives as the Marks & Spencers of British politics, while his own Liberal Democrats were the Body Shop — the niche marketers.

COLIN CAMPBELL

How the Chancellor got lost on his way to the Budget

A shortfall in tax revenues and overshoot on public spending trapped Clarke

On Tuesday afternoon, just after Kenneth Clarke sat down in the Commons, I asked a senior Treasury official what had happened to all the money the Chancellor had been expected to use on tax cuts and reductions in the PSBR. The official, suddenly liberated from Budget purdah, replied with wonderful directness: "We lost it."

Those three words, as well as demonstrating that some Treasury officials may actually have human souls, said everything we need to know about the Budget. So let me devote the next 1400 words to explicating this Delphic trionym.

Let me begin with the £7 billion the Treasury has mislaid through tax shortfalls. The Budget has proved yet again what a disaster befell the Government and the country when Norman Lamont decided to give the Bank of England a dominant role in the setting of interest rates. Treasury officials say that a £7 billion revenue loss was far too big to be explained by the slowdown in economic growth after the Bank started raising interest rates at the end of last year.

"Changes in behaviour" appear to have dramatically reduced the yields from Corporation Tax and VAT (which rather begs the question of why nothing was done in the Budget to raise more revenues from the corporate sector, for example through a utility windfall tax). But while avoidance activity may have accounted for most of the revenue shortfall, economic weakness also played an important role.

So far in the 1995-96 financial year, the economy has grown by 2.5 per cent compared with a year earlier. This compares with the 1994 Budget forecast of 3.25 per cent growth. According to the Treasury's published estimates, this shortfall in growth should reduce government revenues by about £1.6 billion this financial year and by about £3 billion in 1996-97.

The mandarins see this as a tiny figure in the context of total government revenues estimated at £285 billion in 1996-97. But as Mr Clarke said on Tuesday, the PSBR is a small number figure which depends on the difference between two very big numbers. This is true a fortiori of the amount of money available to a Chancellor to give back in tax cuts.

It is worth reflecting on how the Budget judgment might have been altered if that £3 billion of revenues had not been squeezed out of existence by the over-restrictive monetary policy demanded by Eddie George. If Mr Clarke had wanted to reinforce his image as the Iron Chancellor, he could have delighted the financial markets by announcing a PSBR of below £20 billion for 1996-97. Alternatively, his scope to make tax cuts this week could have been doubled. With £6 billion to hand back instead of £3 billion, Mr Clarke could, for example, have answered his backbenchers' prayers (though not, I must admit, my own preferences) by cutting the standard rate of tax by 3p.

Is there any chance of the Treasury recovering some of the "lost" tax money? That depends entirely on what Mr Clarke does on interest rates.

Interest rates will obviously fall after this Budget. The certainty which the City now feels on this question is a measure not of the Chancellor's fiscal prudence but of the Government's desperation — for tax revenues as well as for votes. Indeed, the Halifax Building Society jumped the gun yesterday by announcing a cut in its mortgage rate. But how different would the message have been, both in political and economic terms, if the rate cut had been announced instead by the Chancellor in the Budget.

An immediate cut in interest rates — with another firmly promised for next year if the economy and the housing market remained weak — should have been presented as an integral part of the Budget package, indeed as its very core. An explicit promise to reduce interest rates in response to signs of economic weakness would have allowed the Chancellor to offer a credible guarantee against the recession dreaded by voters and the overshoot in public borrowing which worries investors. Such a guarantee could have gone a long way to restore confidence in the City and the business community, as well as boosting the housing market and reassuring insecure voters.

Yet, the Chancellor has stuck slavishly to the monetarist orthodoxy which says that monetary decisions must be kept completely separate from all other issues of economic policy. Since Mr Clarke is so timid, perhaps the chairman of the Halifax should be invited to deliver next year's Budget instead.

Now let us turn to the money dropped on the spending side of the ledger. Prior to the Budget, many commentators (myself included) believed that the Chancellor could easily cut £5 billion or £6 billion out of the £260 billion public expenditure "control total", even after allowing some extra spending on education and health. But, in the event, he saved only £3.2 billion. The difference between Mr Clarke's achievements and the expectations was equivalent to about 1.5p off the standard rate of tax.

A glance at the main spending table from the Budget "Red Book" shows how this money was "lost". The bottom line of the table shows that £3.2 billion has been cut from the contingency reserve. This was very much as expected. The surprise was that the Chancellor failed to find any savings on top of this sum. Specifically, there is no sign of the £1.5 billion that might have been saved in the current financial year because inflation, as measured by the GDP deflator, has turned out 0.5 percentage points lower than the Treasury had projected. There is also no trace of the £2 billion taken out of capital programmes via the private finance initiative or of the much discussed but as yet unquantified reduction in administrative running costs. Taken together, these savings should easily have added up to the missing £2-£3 billion. So where did this money go?

The answer can be seen more clearly by looking at the money that is being spent this year than at speculative projections about 1996-97. The bottom line of the table shows that spending this year will be £800 million lower than planned, even though inflation and administrative savings should have taken some £2 billion out of public spending. The reality is that most of the money that was saved through tighter administration, low inflation and now the private finace initiative is being spent on over-runs elsewhere.

Looking again at 1995-96, there have been huge overruns at the Foreign Office (£310m), Transport (£240m), the Home Office (£170m), Social Security (£1.1 billion), the Cabinet Office (£170m) and local authorities (£600m). Each of these has a respectable explanation. The main ones are as follows: Bosnia; Channel Tunnel rail link delays; police and prisons; rising take-up of disability benefits; civil service redundancy payments; and education spending.

All these may be perfectly good causes on which to spend public money and the same may be true of the new public expenditure programmes announced on Tuesday by Mr Clarke: the extra money for nursery vouchers and assisted places; the additional money allocated to health trusts; the 5,000 extra policemen and so on. But if the Government keeps inventing extra programmes, it can hardly expect the same money to be left for tax cuts at the end of the year. The same is true of all the managerial efficiencies and spending reductions that Tory ministers constantly boast of.

Under Britain's present system of running the public sector, the savings supposedly generated by slash-and-burn management consultants and right-wing ministers usually go straight back into extra public spending. Indeed, there is no disgrace for any department in overshooting its targets. The Treasury is satisfied as long as some money can be squeezed out of another department or the contingency reserve.

This self-perpetuating quality of public spending may or may not seem desirable, depending on your political point of view. But it is certainly far removed from Thatcherite ideology. It tells us not only why the Treasury has "lost" our money, but also why the Tories have lost their way.

Lignite a cheaper power source for Northern Ireland

From Mr Charles T. Morley

Sir, Northern Ireland Electric (NIE) is reported to be "making too much profit ... electricity costs more in Northern Ireland than in the rest of the UK", according to the all-party Northern Ireland Affairs Select Committee ("NIE too much profit", November 23). Why should this remain so in the future?

Northern Ireland has over one billion tonnes of good quality, low-sulphur lignite coal in three proven deposits. This energy fuel is close to the surface, is suitable for low-cost open-pit mining, and can supply several mine-mouth electricity generating stations.

Lignite would produce cheap power, something the coal and oil currently in use do not seem to be able to do.

And what is planned for the future? There are plans to import expensive power from mainland UK through two of our recently-privatised utilities. Scottish Electricity is to bring in electricity generated from Scottish coal by undersea cable to Larne. British Gas is to pipe in gas to Ballyhumford, an electricity generating station on the County Antrim coast.

In the Province, one lignite deposit at Crumlin, with a proven 200 million tonnes, has already been part-developed. Lignite from a trial pit has been shown to be ideal for burning in a power station.

Much of the land required has been purchased and some of the pre-feasibility work has been completed. The deposit could support a 600-megawatt station adjacent to the open pit.

Further north, reserves exceed 600 million tonnes at Ballymoney. One company is poised to complete land purchase and technical studies, confident it can supply up to 1,000 megawatts into the power grid. Both of these deposits could be brought into production at no capital cost to the public purse.

Environmentalists should note modern lignite mining will never again produce the despoilation seen in the old lignite mining areas of East Germany. Ample safeguards will be built in to planning permission.

Jobs will be created: for each power station, around 1,500 to 2,000 during construction and 300 permanent jobs thereafter. The "multiplier effect" will bring in another 200 to 300 jobs in support and services industries.

Northern Ireland could be an exporter of electricity, to mainland Britain and to the Irish Republic. We are never going to get cheap power from our own generators — listen to the squeals from our industry at the ever-increasing power costs, way above inflation. We could get cheap electricity from Northern Ireland.

Yours faithfully,
CHARLES T. MORLEY,
Oak Lodge,

Budleigh Salterton,
Devon.

Real first duty of management

From W.J Morgan

Sir, I am most surprised to read that Mr N. F Durrant considers the first duty of the directors and management of any company is to the shareholders. How can he be so naive?

It is several years since Mr Jo Grimond (later to become Lord Grimond) wrote that public companies are run for the benefit of the directors, and this dictum is just as true today as it was then.

Yours faithfully,
W. J. MORGAN,

Amsa shows it means business in Latin America

Colin Campbell on Minorco's commitment to a continent

Minorco, the international natural resources group, is marching through the world with pick and cheque book.

This week, it was the purchase of Tilcon Holdings, the UK's seventh largest producer of aggregates, from BTR for £330 million in a further expansion of its aggregates interests.

Last week, in the third deal within four years in eastern Germany, Minorco acquired another sand and gravel operation, this time paying $44 million. In Ireland, Minorco, in partnership with Ivernia West, is spending $180 million on the Lisheen zinc/lead deposit.

Meanwhile, in South America between now and the year 2001, Amsa, its wholly owned subsidiary, together with strong financial partners, is committing itself to five mining projects in five countries.

The South American programme is billed at $4 billion, of which Minorco's share is $2 billion. The territory stretches from Argentina to Venezuela, from Brazil to Chile. The focus is on copper, nickel and gold in a continent which is a treasure trove of deposits waiting to be developed. Amsa first put a foot in Latin America in the 1970s. By the early 1990s, it had become the largest and most diversified private mining group on the continent. Today, on the threshold of a new century, it has never been so positive.

> Partnerships are a basic fundamental of Minorco's philosophy

A $4 billion programme brings management full circle. Guy Young, the charismatic chief executive, said that five years ago Amsa was "gloomy about political and economic prospects, and uncertain where it was going in South America".

The new air of confidence partly stems from the 1993 change in "management control" when ownership of Amsa passed from South Africa's Anglo American Corporation to Minorco.

At just this time, governments across Latin America were opening up to international investment and encouraging mining exploration. For mining groups held in check by environmental pressures in North America and Australia, South America is the new frontier.

The $4 billion programme will include $1.3 billion for Collahuasi, a huge copper project in northern Chile jointly owned with Canada's Falconbridge. Collahuasi will be one of the largest copper mines in the world with a life of at least 45 years.

In northern Brazil, in partnership with state-controlled CVRD, $1.5 billion will be spent developing the Salobo copper/gold deposit, and will include a dedicated smelter and refinery. In Peru, at a height of 3,800 metres, Amsa is interested, with the International Finance Corporation, an affiliate of the World Bank, which has a 20 per cent stake, in the Quellaveco copper deposit. This venture will absorb $500 million. In time, more ventures in Peru are likely.

In Venezuela, 80 kilometres from Caracas, Amsa has a 10 per cent interest — with the right to increase to 85 per cent — in the Loma de Hierro nickel deposit. About $325 million would be needed to develop it.

But it is for the Patagonia region of Argentina for which Amsa reserves the phrase "most exciting". There, in 50:50 partnership with the Perez Companc group, a leading Argentine conglomerate, geologists have identified what in mining circles is already being talked of as "fabulous" — Cerro Vanguardia, a gold deposit with extensive silver as a by-product. Amsa is expected to announce results of its extensive feasibility study of Cerro Vanguardia before the year end.

Minorco has long been a cash-rich group which, when it invests, invests in millions. Indeed, Minorco is out to ensure that each of its five divisions — gold, base metals, paper and packaging, agribusinesses and industrial minerals — is expanded in its own right, and strong operating income flow is balanced soundly enough to offset the volatility of metals cycles.

Minorco has long been inbued with the philosophy that it cannot hope to do things on its own. Strategic partnerships are a fundamental principle of its philosophy. As a consequence, Amsa has long been friends with Brazil's Bozano Simonsen group and Argentina's Perez Companc group.

But while acquisitions in Europe have been catching this month's headlines, it is Amsa that most intrigues analysts. South American operations contributed $77 million to Minorco's operating earnings of $291 million in the 12 months ended December 1994, and 16 per cent, or $554 million, of Minorco's 1994 total sales. However, as a 100 per cent owned subsidiary, Amsa's true light is hidden under Minorco's umbrella.

A case can be made for listing Amsa in its own right on an international stock exchange to demonstrate its true value. If not an Amsa listing, then Minorco itself might consider raising its own flag on a South American stock exchange to demonstrate to Latin American investors, in whose province it operates, that Minorco has arrived and plans to stay.

At least one in ten City employees takes drugs, says report

Cannabis is the most popular drug in the City

BY PHILIP BASSETT, INDUSTRIAL EDITOR

TEN per cent or more of City employees take drugs. And many of those drug users are in responsible jobs, handling large amounts of money, a leading City medical expert reports today.

But cannabis, rather than the cocaine seen as the favourite of high-flying City yuppies, is the City's drug of choice.

Between 10 and 15 per cent of job applicants in the City currently test positive for drugs, according to new evidence presented today by the Institute of Personnel and Development — although some City insiders may regard that as an underestimate.

A study in People Management, the IPD's magazine, says that most of those testing positive are City employees applying for other City jobs, and are often employed dealing with substantial sums of money.

Dr Michael Turner, chief medical officer for City Medical Services, which runs drug-testing programmes for businesses, says today that "drugs are not only readily available, but significant numbers of prospective employees regularly take them".

He says: "Most recruits who are screened in the City — including those who test positive — are already working for financial institutions, often in senior positions."

Drugs cross occupational, class and regional barriers, he says. "There is a perception that cocaine is the most commonly abused drug in the City. That isn't true — cannabis is. Two out of every three people who test positive in the City have been using cannabis."

The remainder of City drug users tend to use cocaine. LSD or amphetamines. Cocaine, Dr Turner says, is "expensive and wears off quickly", and Ecstasy has "fallen into disrepute" because 90 per cent of what is sold as Ecstasy turns out to be sugar, flour or some other substance.

LSD is "easy to get hold of at the moment, and appears to give good value for money because it is cheap and has a long-lasting effect".

A number of companies claim that they do not have a drugs problem because they never find any used syringes in the lavatories, the study says, although it adds: "If you measure the severity of your drug problem by the number of needles you find, you might as well give up now."

Arguing for employers to introduce random drug tests of employees as well as pre-employment screening if they want to deter people from taking drugs, the IPD's study says that a high peformer in the City who is found to be taking drugs is likely to be "dried out" rather than dismissed, though people testing positive before being hired are almost always rejected.

But already-employed users are often put through eight-week rehabilitation programmes costing £6,000 or more per employee. Texaco, the oil company, gives positive-testing employees a second chance, though they are then monitored for five years. Shell and British Rail are other companies cited as having tough drugs policies, while the Bank of England's code of conduct says that financial institutions should take "positive steps" to deal with the problem of drugs at work.

Dr Turner says that alcohol abuse can cause as many problems at work as drugs, though a cannabis user is likely to be treated far more severely. While alcohol can kill quite easily, he says, "cannabis is only fatal if a large enough block of it falls on someone from a great height".

National Home Loans returns to dividend list

BY ROBERT MILLER

NATIONAL Home Loans (NHL), the centralised lender, signalled its return to the corporate fold by declaring a dividend of 1p, its first payout in nearly five years. The payment was made in spite of a "difficult trading environment".

NHL, which yesterday announced a 32 per cent increase in profits to £15.1 million in the year to September 30, said the reward for shareholders was "part of a progressive dividend policy, subject to performance and the prevailing capital requirements of the business".

Jonathan Perry, chairman of NHL, said the recovery phase in the company's fortunes, from corporate basket case in the early 1990s to a more prudently managed and broadly based business, ended at the start of the year with a £50.2 million rights issue and capital reconstruction. He said future growth at NHL would come from activities outside the traditional mortgage market, such as supplying credit, administrative and debt collection skills to other financial services providers, utilities and local authorities. In July, NHL, which may also enter the consumer lending market, agreed to administer and collect on a portfolio of unsecured loan balances on behalf of a leading US bank.

On the old NHL Corporation mortgage book, which has 31,646 (34,933) accounts with gross mortgage balances of £1.4 billion (£1.5 billion), repossessions rose in the second half to 406 from 348, although for the year they fell to 754 from 837. Traditionally, many borrowers with an NHL Corporation mortgage have paid higher rates than the prevailing standard mortgage rate, reflecting the overall quality and risk profile of the portfolio. The company said redemption rates were higher in the later stages of the financial year, primarily as a result of remortgage activity in the summer.

NHL's Homeloans Direct, the group's new lending company which distributes its products through a network of 1,600 authorised organisations, made offers and had applications in progress to more than 1,600 people with a value of £76 million. Mr Perry said its new mortgage lending arm would not chase volume business at any price, arguing that substantial upfront inducements, such as the cashbacks and discounts which currently dominate the homeloans market, were "unsustainable in the medium term as this type of lending is only marginally profitable".

Mr Perry said the rise in NHL's expenses of £10.3 million (£8.6 million), reflected a provision of £750,000 to cover redundancy costs arising from "a review of operations" this summer which resulted in 75 job losses. Loss provisions fell more than 50 per cent to £4.3 million compared with the previous financial year.

Maxwell grief 'was ignored'

BY A CORRESPONDENT

IT WAS "shabby and grotesque" to suggest that Kevin Maxwell was motivated by power and the creation of wealth when he pledged shares to secure a loan for the ailing Maxwell empire, a jury at the Central Criminal Court was told yesterday.

In circumstances of "grief, shock and exhaustion", Kevin was trying to save the family business, said Alun Jones, QC, Kevin Maxwell's counsel, on day two of his closing speech. "We argue he was honest to pledge the shares to try and save the group."

The prosecution has said he was dishonest because he knew that £22 million of shares in Teva, the Israeli company, belonged to BIM, which administered the pension fund, and not to the Maxwell Group (RMG).

Kevin Maxwell has told the jury he believed his father, who told him during their last meeting that the shares had been transferred from BIM to RMG.

Suggestions by Alan Suckling, QC, prosecuting, that Kevin Maxwell had been motivated by power and the creation of wealth were described by Mr Jones as "grotesque and shabby".

"To say he was interested in power is a complete travesty of the evidence you have heard from other witnesses." He said the prosecution had not allowed for Kevin Maxwell's desire to save a family legacy.

Dealing with other claims by Mr Suckling about Kevin Maxwell, Mr Jones said: "What witness has said he was a bully? What witness has said he threatened any witness? The worst we have is that he was brisk."

Kevin, 36, his brother Ian, 39, and Larry Trachtenberg, 42, a former Maxwell adviser, deny conspiracy to defraud the pension funds.

Yoav Gottesman, the chairman of JLI, said trading conditions were difficult

Cutback on film snacks hits JLI

BY MARTIN BARROW

MOVIE buffs munched their way through less popcorn than expected in the summer, according to JLI Group, the snack foods company, which blamed the hot weather and a poor supply of films.

The company also gave a warning of a downturn in the appetite for nuts, with demand unlikely to recover in the short term. As a result, it is closing its snack-processing factory at Bootle at a cost of £800,000. The shares fell 7p yesterday after it said it would hold the interim dividend at 1.65p a share for the half year to September 30. During the period, pre-tax profits rose to £2.8 million, from £1.7 million, assisted by a £1.4 million exception gain on the sale of Jack L. Israel, the import and distribution business.

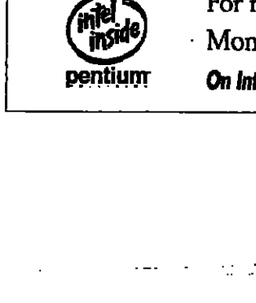

At the operating level, profits dropped to £1.8 million from £2.2 million, with a decline in turnover to £40.7 million from £54.3 million.

Yoav Gottesman, the chairman, said that the results were attained against a continued background of difficult trading conditions.

Earnings, excluding the exceptional gain, fell to 2.3p a share from 2.8p. The dividend will be paid on February 2.

UK and other foreign institutional investors expected to play key role

Australia to sell rest of Commonwealth Bank

Beazley: sale objective

FROM RACHEL BRIDGE IN SYDNEY

A SIGNIFICANT stake in Commonwealth Bank, one of Australia's biggest banks, looks set to be sold to UK and other foreign institutional investors after the Australian Government yesterday signalled its intention to sell its entire A$5 billion (£2.5 billion) stake.

The Government had planned to sell its remaining 50.4 per cent interest in the bank in two tranches, with one sale to take place by next June and the other in 1997.

However, Kim Beazley, Minister for Finance and Deputy Prime Minister, confirmed yesterday: "The objective at this stage of the game is to look at a sale in its entirety this financial year." He added: "The sale is something we would have to give consideration to as we look at the advice that comes to us, but those are our intentions to this point."

The Commonwealth Bank increased its profits by 44 per cent to A$983.2 million for the year to June 1995. The Australian Government sold the first 29.3 per cent of the bank in September 1991 for A$1.7 billion and sold a second tranche of 20.3 per cent in November 1993 for A$1.3 billion.

Australian banking analysts say that the sale of the shares in a single issue — by far the biggest in Australia — will be far too great for the local stock market to swallow. One said: "Offshore investors will be the key component of this transaction. This is just too big to be done domestically."

Selling the entire stake in one go would, however, enable the Australian Government to balance its budget ahead of the Federal election, which must take place before May next year. One banking analyst said: "Politically and budget-mindedly, it's incredibly sensible. They're almost dependent on it."

The Government had budgeted for a small surplus of A$718 million for the year to June 1996, but delays in the sale of ANL, the national shipping line, to Britain's P&O, and the cancellation of the sale of the remaining shares in AIDC, the finance company, mean that it now faces a budget deficit of almost A$1 billion.

However, its decision to open the door to a high level of foreign ownership could backfire — there was a huge outcry when foreign institutions ended up with about half the shares in Qantas, Australia's national airline, after an offering this year.

The lead managers to the sale of the final tranche are expected to be appointed next week with County Natwest, BZW and SBC Warburg understood to be the three leading contenders for the role.

BUSINESS ROUNDUP

Power chief to get chair at Medeva

MEDEVA, the drugs company that attempted to merge with Fisons in the summer, has appointed John Baker, the chairman of National Power, to take over from Bernard Taylor, the outgoing chairman. Mr Taylor, who joined Medeva at its formation six years ago, said he had always intended to retire at 60. He will step down in April with enough share options to ensure him a comfortable semi-retirement in Australia. He has about 4.3 million options, most of which were granted at 89p. The shares traded yesterday at around 274p.

Medeva, a medium-sized player whose speciality is vaccines and respiratory treatments, is trying to build up its foreign presence through the acquisition of both pharmaceuticals companies and individual products that are in their development stage. Fisons would have given it a ready-made international sales and marketing arm. Mr Baker, 57, who is currently a non-executive director of Medeva, will become non-executive chairman and will be working with Bill Bogie, the chief executive. His salary, which has not been set, will likely be two to three times higher than the £25,000 he receives now.

Sema buys French stake

SEMA GROUP, the Anglo-French systems integration and facilities management company, is acquiring a 40 per cent stake in TS FM Holdings, an outsourcing and software maintenance subsidiary of France Télécom, for £22.9 million. Sema has an option to buy a further 10 per cent stake in TS FM, the outsourcing business of FTLIS, the information technology arm of France Télécom, for £5.9 million. The move follows the acquisition in 1993 by FTLIS of a 25 per cent stake in Sema's outsourcing business in the UK. TS FM's operations will be integrated into Sema's worldwide network. TS FM had a turnover of £67.8 million in 1994.

Aetna in $4bn sale

TRAVELERS GROUP has agreed to buy Aetna Life & Casualty's property and casualty business for $4 billion in cash, creating one of America's largest property and casualty insurers. Travelers expects the acquisition to result in the elimination of about 3,300 jobs over the next two years. Both companies are based in Hartford, Connecticut. The new company will be financed by raising $900 million through preferred stock, $1.5 billion of senior debt through public offerings, and about $1.3 billion of equity both through private sales, including a separate $200 million investment from Aetna, and a public offering of common stock next year.

Support for aerospace

TIM EGGAR, the Minister of State for Trade and Industry, last night pledged the Government's support for a campaign to restore the health of Britain's aerospace industry and win a 13 per cent share of the world aerospace market. In a speech in Bristol, Mr Eggar backed his promise with the publication of a joint government/industry statement of aims entitled Partnership in Aerospace. Sir Barry Duxbury, director of the Society of British Aerospace Companies, hailed the Government support for the industry's National Aerospace Framework as of "fundamental importance".

Evans of Leeds ahead

EVANS of Leeds, the property investment and development company, lifted pre-tax profits to £5.4 million from £4.6 million in the half year to September 30, reflecting an 8.5 per cent increase in the rent roll to £25.5 million and a 6.4 per cent rise in investment income to £12.72 million. Acquisitions of investment properties in the period totalled £9 million. The programme of development and refurbishments is expected to reach £10 million this year. Turnover was £13.1 million, compared with £12.3 million previously. Earnings were 3.02p a share, rising from 2.65p. The interim dividend is increased to 0.96p a share from 0.87p, payable on January 5.

Rise in foreign firms

MORE than a quarter of employees in manufacturing plants in Scotland in 1994 — estimated at 83,000 — worked for foreign-owned firms, according to Overseas Ownership in Scottish Manufacturing Industry, 1994, published by the Scottish Office. More than 56 per cent of these were in American-owned plants. Statistics derived from plants with 11 or more employees show that over the ten years to 1994 the number of overseas-owned manufacturing plants rose by 4 per cent and associated employment by 15 per cent. In the past two years, however, employment in overseas-owned plants fell slightly.

ACCOUNTANCY

Teamwork is the future

Anthony Carey believes corporate governance must blend 'opposites'

Sir Ronnie Hampel, chairman of the new committee on corporate governance, has said that striking the right balance between entrepreneurship and stewardship will be one of its key tasks.

Fortunately, the tension between the two is far less than is sometimes suggested by protagonists of one school or the other. For a lean and effective corporate governance system, they need to be seen as indivisible elements of good management to be pursued simultaneously, rather than as forces pulling in opposite directions.

Over the longer term, the top-performing companies are likely to continue to be those that satisfy the rising expectations of their stakeholders. The markets in which UK companies operate are changing rapidly. The whole of the European Union is now our domestic market and, globally, competition is increasing.

A communications revolution is under way. Environmental issues are high on the business agenda and work patterns are changing. In a world where certainties are gone, companies will succeed only if they enjoy the trust and wholehearted support of their customers, shareholders, employees and other stakeholders. An excessive emphasis on either stewardship or entrepreneurship at the expense of the other will not be a good recipe for survival, let alone prosperity.

To make a positive contribution to the governance of UK-listed companies without increasing "red tape", the new committee should identify the critical success factors underpinning world-class performance. Ensuring that board members, executive and non-executive, are individually of the highest ability and have a strong sense of business ethics, will surely be close to the top of the list. In addition, board members need to work together as a team to command the confidence of their principal stakeholders.

These objectives are most likely to be secured by all directors being selected through a formal process which, along with the appointments themselves, should be a matter for the whole board. At present, such requirements apply only to non-executives.

The process adopted should be disclosed in the annual report so that shareholders can have the relevant information when voting on new appointments. Further, all companies should prepare a formal job specification before identifying possible candidates for a position, and consider requiring the largest listed companies to establish nomination committees — more than 60 per cent of the top 250 already have them. Corporate governance does not stop at the boardroom door. The remit of the new committee includes examining the role of shareholders. Institutional investors control about 70 per cent of domestically-held shares in UK-listed companies and thus have a pivotal role in governance.

Anthony Carey says critical success factors show the way

A recent institute research study* found that most institutional investors were committed to voting all their shares, but, for a variety of reasons, this often did not happen in practice. Overall, shareholders cast only about 35 per cent of eligible votes in large listed companies at their AGMs.

The study suggested companies should disclose the level of voting on each resolution, institutional shareholders disclose their voting record for their portfolio as a whole, and measures be introduced to increase the use of proxy votes. Ways of encouraging the individual shareholder to participate more actively should also be identified.

The 12 members of the committee have a wealth of experience of managing, auditing, advising and investing in listed companies. Their verdict on the present state of corporate governance will shape the way companies are run for the new century.

Time runs short for tax reform

THE evidence mounts. There is not only the usual mass of legislation in the small print of the Budget and the additional press releases. That is, in effect, the evidence for the defence. The evidence for the prosecution received another boost last week with the publication of the interim report on tax legislation from the Tax Law Review Committee (TLRC). The case, for which the evidence is accumulating, is tax simplification.

There is urgency here. The next evidence arrives from the Inland Revenue. Under a pioneering amendment to this year's Finance Act, the Revenue is compelled to publish its report on tax simplification by the year end. This is unprecedented and it is likely the Revenue will take a cautious line.

Ernst & Young published its assessment under the title Slipping up on the Road to Tax Reform. "Throughout the year," said the report, "there have been signs that the Revenue's boffins have been toiling away on this report. Strange ideas have been spotted floating through the sky, rather like fiscal UFOs; venerable old proposals have been exhumed from the ground and aired; teams of taxmen have thumbed suspiciously through the slender volumes containing the tax statutes of other nations".

Now they have the TLRC's interim report, they must know time is running out. In February the Financial Secretary to the Treasury assured tax practitioners "the Revenue will want to take full account of the progress of the TLRC". But now it is published, I doubt they will draw any comfort.

ROBERT BRUCE

The game is given away before you so much as turn over the first page of the report. The foreword is written by Lord Howe of Aberavon, the committee's president, a man who presided over numerous Budgets while Chancellor of the Exchequer. In Opposition in 1977, he made a speech in which he denounced "the incoherent drift towards a tax system that is incomprehensible, unrespected, unenforceable — and spinning like a top". Then there was a change of Government and as its first Chancellor, he was in a position to do something about it.

His words in this foreword are mournful. "No, alas, after years in Government, almost half of them as Chancellor or Leader of the House and in a position, or so it might be thought, to do something about all this, I have to confess nothing has changed." He concludes "We did not try hard enough", and hopes that "this strikingly clear report will inspire a fresh generation to try again".

Certainly the report should do that. The question is whether the entrenched and defensive souls at the Revenue, so used to getting it in the neck from political masters and from tax practitioners as well as the traditional complaints of the taxpayers, will want, or be be able, to do anything about it.

The committee's main points are straightforward. The report rejects the usual Revenue argument that simplifying something means that it loses precision and so is open to abuse. It makes the point that the language of tax legislation is aimed at the courts and not at the users. That is the first part of the thicket to be cleared away. "We have no doubt that tax legislation can be written in an accessible style, that it can be no less accurate than the current drafting style, and that there would be very substantial benefits for taxpayers, practitioners and government if it were." To make it clearer, the committee has redrafted two examples and published them with the report. What is remarkable about these is that not only is the language wonderfully clearer, but the purpose of the legislation shines out as well. The second point is that much of the most complex legislation runs into a morass because no one is clear on its effects.

This was precisely why there is still such a fuss about the Paramount Airways case. That came about because the intention of an amendment to legislation was made clear in meetings with Government but was never set down clearly. Hence the committee's view that explanatory memoranda should be published to complement the Finance Bill. "This might include background material, a note of the purpose of each clause and how it would operate, worked examples, answers to difficult points, or any other relevant matter."

Thirdly, to get around the problem of a government saying that rewriting all of the nation's tax legislation would cost too much, a pilot project is recommended. After that a sensible decision based on costs and benefits could be taken. Time is running short and legislation is only going to become more complex.

In 20 years, will a future Lord Clarke of Trent Bridge be shedding tears of remorse over lost opportunities?

Profits for all — on the payroll

IT IS not just Budget pundits who get worried about profit-related pay schemes. Staff at Price Waterhouse are too. The latest issue of The Reporter, the firm's in-house monthly, reflects doubts about the payment of the PRP tranche for the 1995-96 year. "Since there are so many rumours circulating", it says, "the firm would like to take this opportunity to confirm a payment will be made in December." But with the accounts not yet finalised no figures are available. "Nonetheless the firm is confident that the payments will be in line with expectations," it states before adding, "you must be in service at the time of the payment to be eligible to receive it". Indeed.

Paper chase

INCORPORATION may not be the panacea. According to Robert Half, the recruitment consultant, young accountants are jumping ship from large accounting firms in unprecedented numbers. A survey shows that much of this disloyalty dates back to the sudden redundancies of the early 1990s as well as the fact that elsewhere their salaries will leap and their hours plummet. But there is another factor, hitherto unrecorded. They hate the pedantic paperwork. "The pressure of timesheets," says the survey, "was a demoralising irritant."

Ring of confidence

TIMING, as all good finance directors know, is everything. So when Terry Carroll was finalising his thoughtful study of The Changing Role of the Finance Director, (available from Technical Communications on 01462 437075), he approached captains of industry for comments to put in the foreword. "The key qualities," wrote one of them, include "relationships with the investment community and the ability to obtain their confidence." On publication of the study last week those words of Sir Rocco Forte had a certain ring about them.

THE ubiquitous Adrian Randall, the doyen of the charities-accounting world, should need no introductions. But in last week's article we neglected to point out that he heads the charities unit at the firm of Moores Rowland. So, if you didn't know then, you do now.

Safety seen with fresh eyes.

In designing the new Mercedes E-class the task for us was how to make a safe car safer. Here are some of the things we have done.

Using a completely different crash testing procedure, we have now designed a new front end.

One collision, it not only gives more protection to the driver of the Mercedes. Less impact energy would be imparted to the other driver, too.

In fact, recent crash tests carried out by 'Auto Motor und Sport' magazine resulted in the least amount of damage to a passenger safety cell ever recorded.

Just as impressive, was the level of injury measured by the crash test dummies.

This was also significantly lower than any previous figure.

The new E-class also has the first safety belt system developed to work specifically with an airbag.

First, it will restrain you. Then, as the airbag inflates, the belt will slacken slightly allowing you to go forward. The result will be to reduce considerably the risk of any injury to your chest.

We have padded more of the interior, in particular, the dashboard, the steering wheel rim, the roof and the door trim.

Talking of doors, we've also developed better side protection. Both front seat passengers now have the option of side airbags which need just seven milliseconds to activate.

Of course, the usefulness of all our new safety features is something we hope you'll never actually see.

The new Mercedes E-class is, on the other hand, something we hope you do see at the earliest opportunity.

Benefits to rise 3.9% next April

BY OUR BUSINESS STAFF

PETER LILLEY, the Secretary of State for Social Security, has uprated social security benefits in line with inflation from next April. Contributory benefits, including retirement pensions, will rise by 3.9 per cent in line with the retail price index for September 1995.

The standard rate of retirement pension will rise by £2.30 a week for a single person to £61.15 and by £3.65 to £97.75 for couples. The DSS said the cost of the increases is likely to be £2.7 billion in the 1996-97 financial year.

Mr Lilley also announced a plan to restructure benefits for lone parents. The benefits system has acquired a number of elements of special help exclusively for lone parents which are not available to two-parent families. Help for couples and lone parents will gradually be brought into line but with no reduction in cash value of benefits people currently receive.

Rates of lone-parent premium paid with income-related benefits and one-parent benefit will be unchanged.

BT chief to take over at Energis

BY ERIC REGULY

ENERGIS, the loss-making telecommunications company that is owned by the National Grid, has hired a BT veteran with international experience to help it to find a partner for strategic alliances.

Mike Grabiner, 45, BT's director of European operations, is to become chief executive in January. He replaces David Dey, who left Energis in July after differences with Gordon Owen, the chairman.

Mr Grabiner has spent most of his career at BT and has been looking for the opportunity to run a telecoms company.

His departure is said to have nothing to do with BT's recent management overhaul, which sees the departure of Michael Hepher, the managing director, and the appointment of Peter Bonfield as chief executive.

Mr Grabiner's background should help Energis, which has lost more than £100 million since its launch a couple of years ago, get back on its feet. He has been responsible for BT's European expansion, including its partnership with Viag, the Bavarian industrial group.

Waddington beats costs to rise 16%

BY PHILIP PANGALOS

STRONG growth in pharmaceutical packaging helped John Waddington, the packaging group that sold its games division to Hasbro for £50 million a year ago, to overcome higher raw-material costs with a 15.9 per cent rise in first-half profits.

Organic growth and better margins fuelled a rise in pre-tax profits to £11.5 million in the half year to September 30 (£9.9 million). Turnover, boosted by acquisitions, expanded 17.3 per cent to £144 million. Underlyng organic growth, excluding acquisitions and divestments, saw operating profit rise 13.4 per cent and sales 16.2 per cent.

Direct marketing was a star performer, with profits up 120 per cent to £3.3 million, while the fast-growing pharmaceutical packaging operation saw profits double to £2.2 million as margins improved to 21.8 per cent (18 per cent).

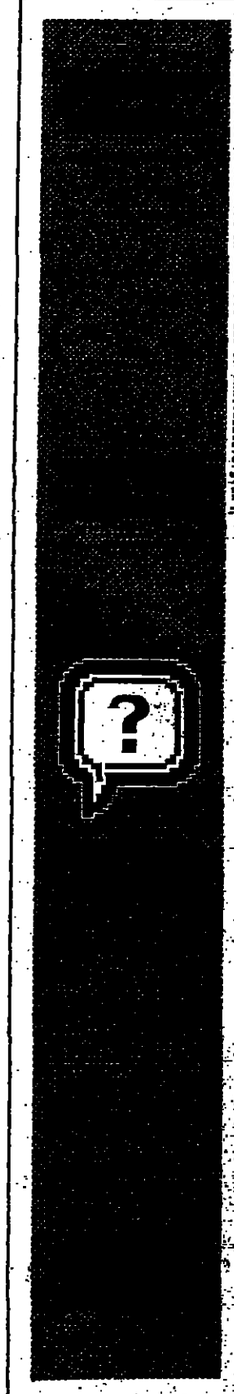

Waddington's US food-services operation, which is the main contributor to the core plastic-packaging operation, benefited from a recovery of substantial increases in raw material costs which have hit the industry in the past year.

However, the group was adversly affected by a disappointing performance in plastic packaging for the food and drink sector, with operating losses rising to £1.4 million (£300,000 loss). The losses were entirely due to Plastona in the UK, with the group "actively reviewing" several options. The cost base has been cut by £1 million, but the container market suffered a further deterioration in demand in the second quarter.

The paper and board packaging division increased sales to £41.8 million (£24.2 million) and operating profits 56.9 per cent to £3.8 million, in spite of the hot summer reducing demand for confectionery products and prepared meals.

Martin Buckley, chief executive, expects an improvement in performance in the second half, partly helped by seasonal demand for cartons and reduced volatility in raw material costs.

There is an interim dividend of 4p (3.8p), payable on January 18, from earnings ahead to 7.9p (7.88p) a share. The shares eased 3p to 219p.

Half-year turnround for Bandt

BY MARTIN BARROW

BANDT, the industrial products and services company formerly known as Brown & Tawse, returned to profit in the half-year to October 1, earning £1 million before tax compared with losses of £1.2 million previously. The results are the first to benefit from the restructuring of the company after the £32.3 million purchase of Kwikform UK, GKN's scaffolding business, in July.

Earnings were 1.2p a share, compared with losses of 3.7p. There is again no interim dividend, although the board expects to recommend a final dividend in respect of the current financial year. The shares rose 1p to 37p yesterday.

Don McFarlane, chairman, said: "Conditions in the construction industry remain difficult, but with a much broader and firmer base to work from we are confident that the structure we have put in place will enable us to make further progress." Kwikform, which forms the new contracting and hire division, contributed profits of £1.6 million on sales of £15.6 million in the three months since it was acquired. The stockholding and distribution division earned £300,000, compared with a loss of £600,000.

Ken's goose is cooked by a festive turkey

Richard Briers and John Sessions in In the Bleak Midwinter, "a film pitched at such a madcap level that any potential is drowned in artifice"

Each year brings a new film from Kenneth Branagh, and each year a new style. The opening credits to In the Bleak Midwinter ape Woody Allen: white lettering on black, matched to a chirpy popular song; an ensemble cast, listed in alphabetical order. Then whoosh, we're away, pitched into a manic showbiz comedy with a few pauses for tears, shot in black-and-white — a colour scheme made newly fashionable for comedies by guess who? Woody Allen.

Not that the film is entirely impersonal. Both offscreen and on, Branagh likes to wrap himself in camaraderie, from the Shakespearean troupes of Henry V and Much Ado to the university chums who people Peter's Friends. That comedy is this film's nearest equivalent: they share the same garrulity, a similar low budget, the same shallow treatment of serious matters. But Midwinter, written as well as directed by Branagh, is much more cocooned with luvvies than most.

The characters are actors — struggling youngsters, has-beens, eccentrics — rehearsing a dismal production of Hamlet in dismal surroundings: a rural church due for closure, days before Christmas. The situation should prompt sharp comic insights, given Branagh's knowledge of Hamlet and the actor's life. But the film is pitched at such a madcap level that any potential is drowned in artifice.

The implausibilities start right away. What professional actor, however desperate, would expect to get customers for a village church Hamlet on Christmas Eve? And what high-powered agent (played, to boot, by Joan Collins) would ever sanction the folly? Having swallowed those whoppers, you must then contend with a noisy bunch of theatrical types concocted to extract easy laughs. There is the camp pantomime dame roped in to play Gertrude; an Ophelia blind without her specs; a lugubrious drunk; and, lording over the mayhem, a hyperactive producer played by Michael Malone. You may laugh at them at first; then you sigh, then you cringe.

Visually, the film could not be further from the fidgety extravagance of Mary Shelley's Frankenstein. The camera appears nailed to the floor, watching helpless as the characters pace and gibber. Every effect, comic or serious, is whacked home as though we were blind and deaf. There is no gain from Roger Lanser's monochrome photography, apart from the irrelevant beauty of a phone box at night.

No gain, either, from the lurches into sentimentality as the squabbling actors learn how to hug and resolve little family problems. This might be Branagh's most aggravating film yet.

At the beginning of Murder in the First, Kevin Bacon squats in an Alcatraz dungeon, naked, screaming, more animal than human, bereft of light and air. Emerging three years later in 1941, he stabs the prisoner responsible for his ordeal. Originally imprisoned for stealing $5, Bacon now faces a fresh charge: murder in the first degree.

The outlook looks grim, but Christian Slater's public defender will not give in. Glasses in place, brow nicely furrowed, he puts Alcatraz in the dock in the person of Gary Oldman's Warden, a man who probably takes sadistic pleasure in peeling a grape.

This is not the kind of film where you are unsure whom to root for. But there is little time to get bored by this true-life stampede against injustice. Bacon's carefully controlled performance grips like a vice. The screaming beast becomes a limping, taciturn wreck whose mental scars never obscure the man's basic dignity. We give him our sympathy without ever having to be bullied. Slater, usually cast as a wild boy, tackles his unconventional part well, although the courtroom rhetoric eventually palls.

Unfortunately, Marc Rocco, the director, cannot quite trust his performers. Although the film is his fourth feature, he behaves as though it were his debut. He wants to be noticed. He wants razzle-dazzle; and since the story unfolds in confined spaces — cells, courtrooms — he puts all the dazzle into his camera. When not framing some image from a cockeyed position, the camera rushes, circles and swoops. Rocco's ostentation gives the film its dubious air of self-importance, and allows it to miss some of the humour tucked into the situations.

Still, enough intelligence remains to make Murder in the First absorbing viewing.

"Can we get a direct flight to reality, or do we have to change in Denver?" A fair question, since the speaker stands in a red suit and white beard, surrounded by elves at the North Pole. But, since The Santa Clause is a Disney family film, reality is way off the flight map. True, the main character is a divorced, frustrated dad. But the environment is the usual American dream: large houses festooned with lights, snow deep and crisp and even, families with money to burn.

To its credit, John Pasquin's film (America's box-office hit last Christmas) tries hard to satisfy both the wide-eyed child and the adult cynic. Television sitcom star Tim Allen finds a good vehicle for his low-key style as the toy company executive who puts on a Santa suit and cannot shake the character off. Special effects play their part: there are aerial trips with reindeer and magical descents down heating vents. The film is no classic, but at least it puts human beings in the foreground, not technology.

"We have two pearls on our hands, Isabelle, two pearls!" crows Julie Walters's Madame Danzard, a French provincial dragon who prides herself on the probity of her new maids. Their approval rating soon plummets: in Sister My Sister, based on the same 1930s murder case that inspired Genet's play The Maids, the sibling servants, Joely Richardson and Jodhi May, bottle up so many dangerous feelings that violence is the only outcome.

This is predominantly a story of ominous looks, dripping taps, and specks of dust on the stair banister. Its natural home is the theatre, where it lived under the title My Sister in this House. The film version of Wendy Kesselman's play uses camera close-ups to emphasise lesbian fondling, and presents the repressed lives upstairs and downstairs in cross-cut scenes. But there is little to suggest that the director Nancy Meckler, who also directed the London stage show, has any real flair for cinema.

Richardson and May work better when their emotions simmer, not boil, while Walters sometimes overplays. Once the film is done, nothing much remains in the mind, although scene by scene Sister is watchable enough.

This is more than can be said for Elisa, a dreary vehicle for Vanessa Paradis, the French pop singer turned actress, who parades her cheekbones and seraphic hair as though she were modelling perfume. The glossy image hardly helps her to convince as a tearaway teenager coping badly with the effects of a mother's suicide and a father's absence. Jean Becker's film is overwrought and improbable; and a late appearance by Gérard Depardieu and a phallic lighthouse do nothing to improve matters.

Meanwhile, over in Seattle and Mad Love, Paradis's fellow sexpot Drew Barrymore busily proclaims that she likes violence, noise, honesty and danger. This meets with Chris O'Donnell's approval; so when school and parents start to get tough, they take to the road. For Antonia Bird, the gutsy British director of Priest, the film proved an unhappy Hollywood baptism; but even without studio tinkering, one suspects Mad Love would still be bad. The script is the problem: bland, shallow, going nowhere. The author, alas, is another British export, television writer Paula Milne.

Meanwhile, among the week's bedlam, a chink of spurs can be heard as Henry Fonda ambles up to the OK Corral. He always walks slowly in My Darling Clementine; but then John Ford's western was made in 1946, when films could take time to establish characters, and allow any action to swirl naturally around them. This is an ageless film, poetic, beautiful, above all humane: the week's biggest treat.

RADIO: Peter Barnard finds 1950s' drama still fresh

Films on the wireless

MOST drama output falls into two categories: contemporary (incomprehensible to anyone over 40) and classical (incomprehensible to anyone under 40). How good to see radio tackling a third category, the explosion of British domestic drama in the 1950s.

Nor is it doing so conventionally. Radio 4 is contributing to the 100th birthday of cinema by putting out films. If that sounds daft, I had better explain that these are films adapted for radio by the writer of the original screenplay.

The Monday Play is the flag under which these productions are sailing. This week we had Alan Sillitoe's Saturday Night and Sunday Morning, excellently performed by a cast every bit as convincing as the stars of the 1960 film.

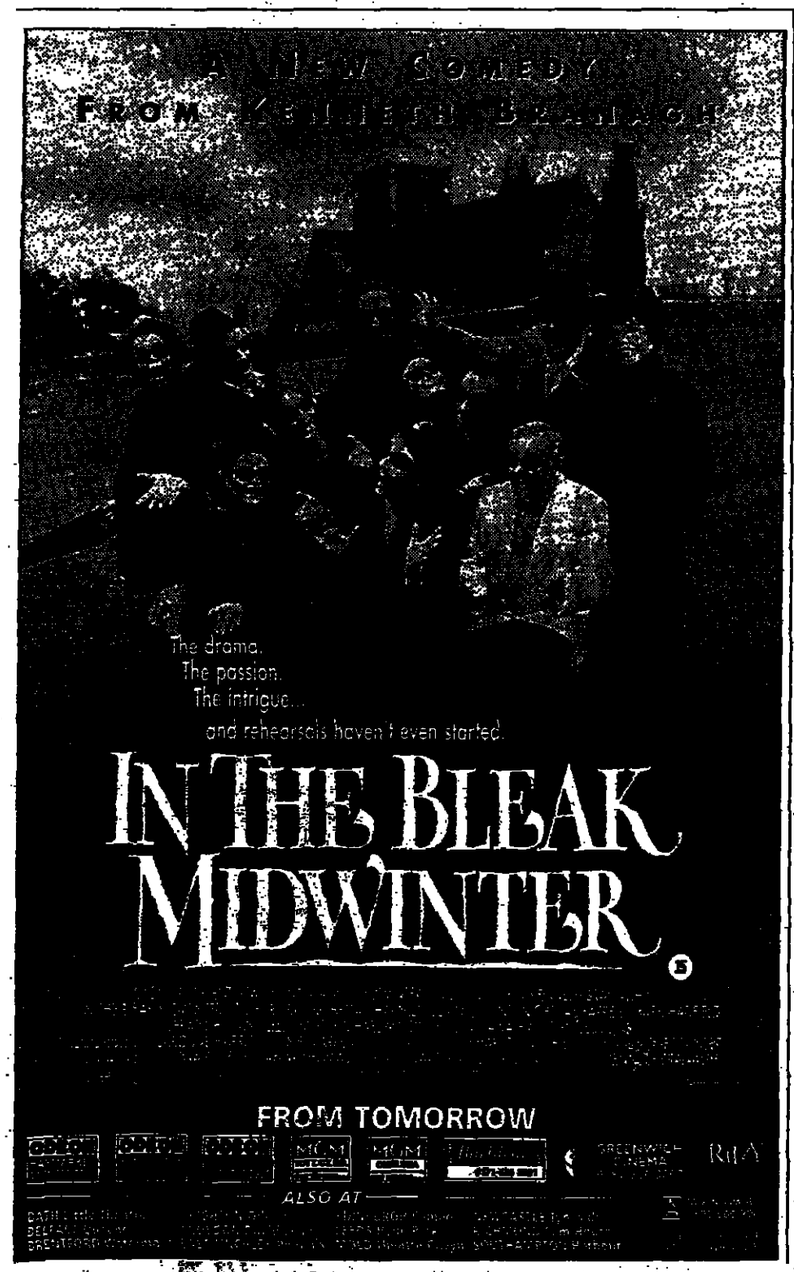

In fact, Sillitoe said before transmission that he had been none too sure about Albert Finney as Arthur Seaton in the film, meaning, I think, that Finney's technical brilliance may have softened the character.

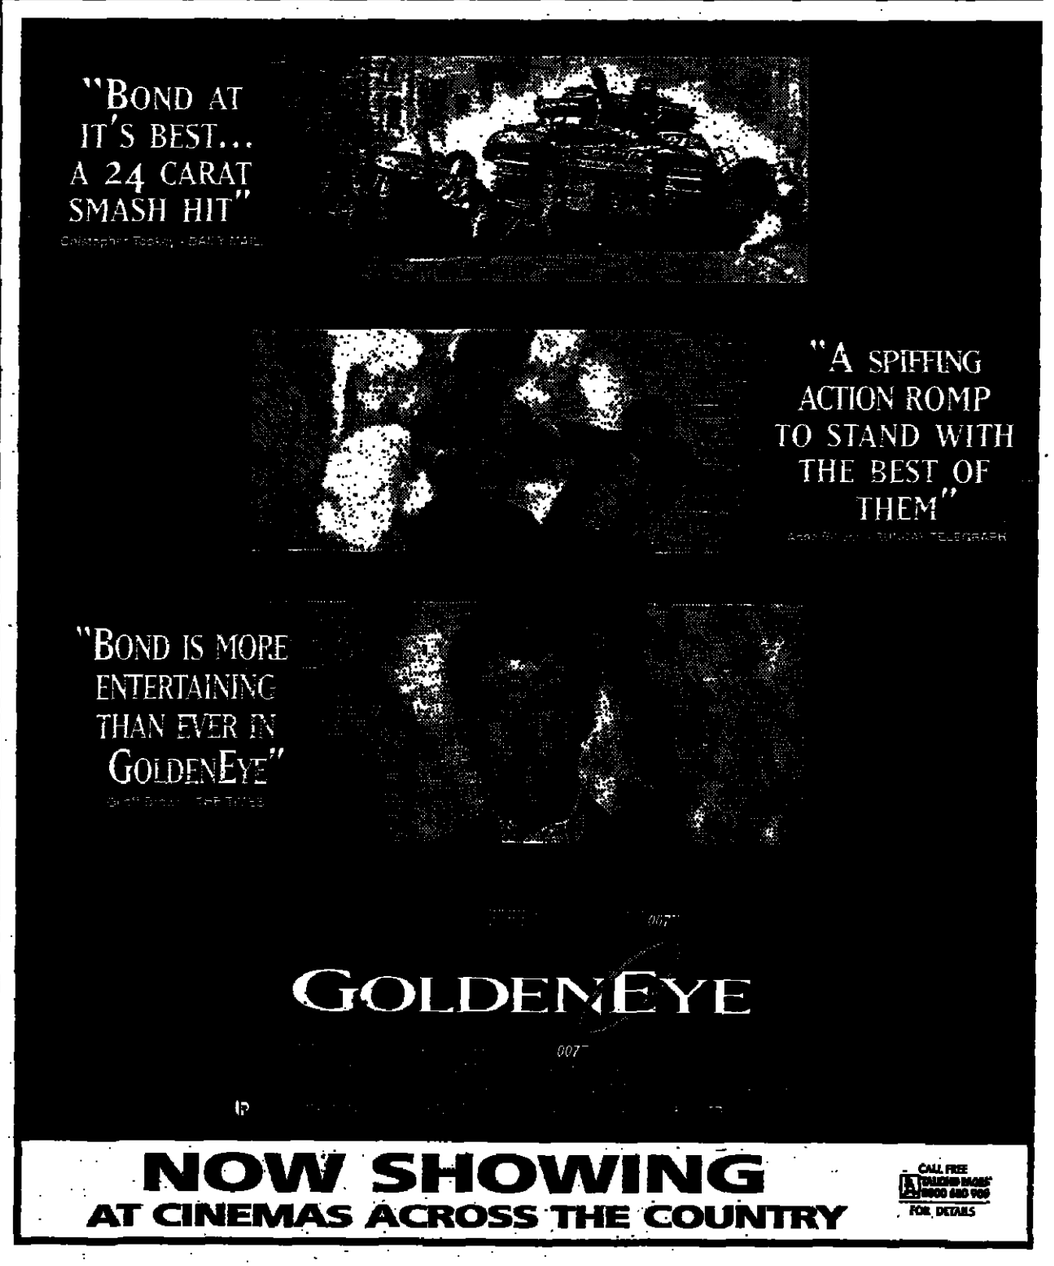

Jamie Glover as Seaton did not lack grit and his delivery mostly overcame the feeling that the slice-of-life intensity of the piece had been dulled since its first manifestation. "Dated" was what Sillitoe called it, but that was only true in relation to some of the themes. The dialogue, reflecting Sillitoe's ability to observe the commonplace, is still sharp.

The theme which "dates" the work is fear of pregnancy. Sillitoe explained that the censors had rejected the plot development in which Seaton's mistress attempts to abort a child. In the book, the attempt was successful; in the film, it failed.

This impertinent circumscribing of a writer's freedom took place at the dawn of the 1960s — before the Pill. Indeed Saturday Night probably looked more dated by 1970 than it does amid the greater moral awareness of the 1990s.

But how interesting that the censors decided that a woman consuming a bottle of gin in a scalding bath could be shown on screen provided the audience was not led to believe that it might work. Modern television does not know how lucky it is, but should perhaps be reminded before it takes one liberty too many.

DANCE

Momix
Sadler's Wells

TRISTRAM KENTON

Baseball loses out: an accomplished troupe is badly served by an uninspiring piece of dance-theatre

Momix's new show at Sadler's Wells, Baseball, was inspired by America's favourite pastime. Now I have been to a few ball games in my time, and never have I seen one as uninspiring as this piece of dance-theatre conceived and directed by Moses Pendleton. With all that grace and power, all that physical instinct and competitive psychology to draw upon, Pendleton has struck out.

As you would expect, a bat and a ball figure large in the sport-dance continuum. Pendleton explores ten things you can do with a bat while the ball, a padded chap on legs, wanders through the ensemble as a jester-cum-fallguy, happily submitting to occasional flattening by one of the aforesaid bats.

There is a scenario of sorts. We start with a pitcher's mound shape-shifting into a huge glacial mountain. The birth of the world is followed by the birth of mankind, as Stone Age people discover the possibilities of a twig and a stone. Then we are into the modern age and ball players — an accomplished troupe of seven men and women — take to the field for almost two hours of vignettes.

Bats are swung — sometimes beautifully — and are used as gymnastic props, and the manual dexterity of the hard-working dancers is impressive. But the baseball theme, supported by slide projections illustrating key moments in the history and mythology of the game, quickly wears thin.

Perhaps as a 20-minute pièce d'occasion for the San Francisco Giants (which is how Baseball started life), it had a sporting chance. It also didn't help on opening night that the company's super-sophisticated slide projector broke down, necessitating an unscheduled half-hour interval while the technical crew repaired it.

The score is a ghastly compilation of rap and classical music mixed with nostalgic soundbites. Some of the musical cues are an embarrassment: a man guzzling beer out of a dancing can is suddenly met with James Brown's I Feel Good: the use of Queen singing We Are The Champions reads like a cheap attempt at sentiment.

Everywhere you turn you find pretentiously reverential homage to the game of baseball and its participants. Shattered dreams and fallen heroes are remembered in a maudlin requiem: sequences brazenly tug at the patriotic heartstrings of good Americans for whom baseball is the nation's defining symbol. The choreography, when it appears, hovers between moderately interesting physical illusion and irritatingly coy sexuality, and any good choreographic ideas are quickly diluted by constant repetition.

The end is so earnestly silly that for one horrible moment you think they must really mean it. It is the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel and God's gift to Adam — you guessed it, a baseball.

DEBRA CRAINE

The surreal thing

CBSO / Rattle
Symphony Hall, Birmingham

The real Schnittke is the surreal Schnittke. One movement of his Dead Souls Suite begins with two metronomes set to tick at different tempi, neither of which corresponds to that of the subsequent entries of the organ and celesta, the slow waltz on the piano, the chord clusters on violas, the sounds plucked from the strings under the piano lid.

Gennadi Rozhdestvensky, who arranged the suite from a score written in 1983 for a film version of Gogol's Dead Souls, particularly enjoyed that movement. He set the metronomes himself, placing them on top of the piano as though they were part of some conjuring trick, turned at one point to give the keyboard a massive thwack with both hands and finally, of course, stopped the metronomes with another theatrical sleight-of-hand gesture. Having supported Schnittke's music through the most difficult material and political circumstances, he deserved, in conducting the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra in the first British performance of Dead Souls, that little self-indulgence.

Perhaps Rozhdestvensky had earned the right too to tamper with the orchestration of Tchaikovsky's Manfred Symphony. Certainly, there are problems in getting the bacchanale at one point in the last movement to sound incisive enough in its original scoring for woodwind. But surely it is better either to make it work as it is or to rescore it in such a way that the extra instruments involved — horns and trumpets in this case — can actually play it effectively? Delightfully picturesque though it was in the Alpine Fairy scene, it was not a great performance of Manfred, anyway. Rozhdestvensky seems to be a too sophisticated musician to take absolutely seriously Byronic situations that Tchaikovsky himself clearly found less than completely convincing.

At the beginning of what turned out to be a long concert in Symphony Hall, Haydn's Symphony No 57 in D minor was well chosen neither for the acoustic nor for the programme's structure. It was a surprisingly dull performance.

GERALD LARNER

Happily challenged

LS / Salonen
Queen Elizabeth Hall

For the third and final concert of the London Sinfonietta's "The Composer Conducts" series, Esa-Pekka Salonen directed a programme of his own music alongside pieces by Webern, Lutoslawski and Bernd-Alois Zimmermann. Though the young Finn is better known internationally as a conductor, he started as a composer.

Salonen's output is not large, but most of his pieces reveal a fertile mind. They are neither uncompromising nor compromising in a post-modern way: post-serial might be a better description, for there remains a striking, avant-garde adventurousness about the best of them. Floof, which draws its onomatopoeic text from the Polish science-fiction writer Stanislaw Lem's The Cyberiad, is a humorous work that inhabits a strange sound-world — its five instrumentalists and coloratura soprano are amplified to give an almost "pop" flavour. The young Finnish singer Anu Komsi was an outstanding soloist, whose feat was not only to produce the guttural noises and piercing, stratospheric notes, but to deliver the text flawlessly from memory.

Yta III, for solo cello, was receiving its first London performance. No less fiendishly difficult than Floof, it evokes a moth circling a lamp, finally burning its wings and dying. Salonen has described it as his ugliest and most violent piece, and Anssi Karttunen played the snarling, slithering lines with macabre humour. We also heard the first UK performance of Mimo II, in effect a concerto for oboe and chamber orchestra. The title alludes to pantomime, and there is certainly a theatrical feeling to the way in which the soloist (Gareth Hulse) walks a technical tightrope. But few of the ideas which Salonen apparently develops rigorously came across: to the ear it sounded purely colouristic.

The Salonen pieces were more absorbing than either Lutoslawski's haunting but too-carefully crafted Funeral Music and Zimmermann's tortuous Canto di Speranza, both dispatched with virtuosity. Salonen brought a sense of flow to even the shortest of Webern's miniature Five Pieces, Op 10. A relaxed conductor, he seems to relish any challenge.

Angst in the chattering classes

The Break of Day
Royal Court

Maria Friedman (Nina), Brian Protheroe (Hugh) and Nigel Terry (Robert) in a scene from Timberlake Wertenbaker's new The Break of Day

Last year, Max Stafford-Clark's Out of Joint brought London both Etherege's Man of Mode, a Restoration comedy inspired by the poet Rochester, and Stephen Jeffreys's The Libertine, a modern play directly concerning him. This year the company has been touring The Three Sisters in tandem with Timberlake Wertenbaker's new The Break of Day, which contains a character who is performing Chekhov's Vershinin for a small theatre, and a good deal of conversation on fin-de-siècle topics. The superficial connections between the two are not exactly unmissable.

But what of the deeper parallels? When we think of Chekhov, we surely think of people first, ideas second. We value him less as a social philosopher or prophet than as a human being with a profound understanding of men and women floundering in an era of change. Shaw signally failed to grasp this when he called his brilliant, brittle Heartbreak House "a fantasia in the Russian manner on English themes". Break of Day seems similarly to want to be subtitled: "A Chekhovian rumination on British, end-of-millennium, post-feminist anxieties"; but if Wertenbaker were to admit so, we would have to tell her she was missing something.

It is an intellectually spritely and entertaining piece, and in the second half it has its emotionally authentic passages. By then, a woman's need for children has become the primary subject, and it is one about which Wertenbaker has strong feelings. But there is still no pretending that the main characters are very rich and no concealing that some of the supporting ones are pretty raw.

Couples gather in an English garden: Robert (Nigel Terry), the Chekhov actor; Hugh (Brian Protheroe) a record producer; their wives Tess (Catherine Russell), a once-idealistic journalist turned cynical in middle age, and Nina (Maria Friedman), a singer who has lost her feminist inspiration. Add Jamie (David Fielder), a surgeon enraged by the impending closure of his hospital, and April (Anita Dobson), a lecturer fed up with the erosion of university standards, and we have what is presumably intended to be a representative mix of the liberal English in disillusion and disarray.

The conversation ranges from the awfulness of the 1980s to the awfulness of now to a future likely to be more awful than Chekhov's optimism claimed. Sentences like "compassion and humanity have cracked in the last 15 years and we've let it happen" wing across grass that has presumably been treated with Thatcherite weedkiller, for it too has become arid and parched.

But then a dim but pregnant girl (Kate Ashfield) comes to interrupt the social lament and turn the plot in a more personal direction. In a bold inversion of feminist cliché, both Hugh and Robert want to push their wives up the career ladder, and both Tess and Nina want something a lot more traditional.

The hankering for children takes Tess to a fertility clinic and Nina to an East European country we are assured is not Romania. The scenes with a British doctor who talks of "jollying up your eggs", and ends up blithely recommending foetus implants, is cartoon nightmare. The battles with foreign bureaucracy and ex-communist chaos generate greater tension and fun, although they too tend to be more Gogol than Chekhov. The actors, incidentally, are pretty lively throughout, with the occasional exception of Dobson.

A nice but revealing in-joke starts the second act. Nina and Hugh, waiting nervously in a Balkan airport, are accosted by a couple who mistake them for a theatrical delegation. "Aren't you David Edgar and Caryl Churchill?" they ask, indignantly grabbing back their welcoming bouquets. No; and on the evidence of this play nor yet is Wertenbaker. She has some way to go before she gives us a Top Girls, let alone a Three Sisters.

BENEDICT NIGHTINGALE

An Evening with Ken Morley
Wycombe Swan

Across the nation, the repercussions of that historic television broadcast are still being pondered and argued over. Questions of the utmost importance now have to be confronted. How can the marriage possibly survive? Should the call of duty take precedence over personal desire? How, above all, will they cope at the freezer centre?

The Oprah-fication of Kensington Palace is of secondary importance to devotees of genuine soap opera. The most significant event of last week, as any fule kno, was the departure of Ken Morley — known to millions as frozen food supremo Reg Holdsworth — from the cast of Coronation Street.

After six years in the programme Morley's character, a blustering middle manager and would-be aesthete, has acquired the status of a 1990s Everyman.

In the 1980s, no doubt, Reg would have been as avid a free marketeer as the next man. Now, well into middle age, his hairline fast receding, he sees the competition in the corporate jungle growing more ruthless and demanding by the day. The reality, for a man of Reg's vintage, is that he who dares must wear a toupée.

What secrets, then, would Morley disclose in this audience with the faithful? Ambling on to the stage with — what else? — a supermarket trolley, he had a distinct look of mischief about him, as if he was about to divulge enough behind-the-scenes gossip to keep the tabloids happy until the next lesbian kiss in Brookside.

But in the end Morley (or Reg — the two seem inextricably entwined) proved to be unexpectedly diplomatic. Perhaps the tastiest snippets are being held in reserve for his autobiography.

Never mind. He still had a colourful line in stories about his coming of age in 1950s Lancashire — an era, he recalled, when a young engineering apprentice who wore a pink shirt and listened to Tchaikovsky was asking for trouble.

And if the question-and-answer format was a little awkward, we still heard enough of the old Holdsworth epigrams. If La Rochefoucauld were alive today, he too might be working in a supermarket.

Hopeless hopefuls in city of frantic dreams

Road to Nirvana
Traverse, Edinburgh

Maggie Norris: raffish and contemptuous ex-nun

What we all know about Hollywood is that its heartless inhabitants will do anything, betray anyone, in order to clinch the deal that will make them major operators in the movie business.

A man will "cut his wrists", "eat shit", he will "give his balls" to reach the heights where he can be feared and envied. "It's not love we want," says one of the characters here, or words to that effect. "It's feigned loved." Because only this is charged with the envy essential to confirm one's achievements.

So Arthur Kopit shows us three hopefuls in this city of frantic dreams, and what you may have assumed were just three loose metaphors from me — in the first sentence of my second paragraph — Kopit presents for real: the first one in front of our eyes, the second during the interval, and the third, thankfully, off-stage.

Al is a producer recently fired by a studio but now claiming to be an independent. He has combined forces with Lou, a raffish and contemptuous ex-nun — the mind boggles at her convent — and what binds these two together, and has bound them to the megastar of their new project, only becomes clear in the second half. For the first act we are in Al's Los Angeles garden, between a palm tree and the pool, where he is persuading Jerry, a partner he once fired, to work on the new film.

The script is so hot a property that the title page is a sheet of asbestos. Drooping Jerry, steeped in failure, is confused when the film turns out to be Moby Dick, but this is Melville for sex maniacs. Writer and star is none other than the greatest female rock singer in the history of the world, here called Nirvana. She will play Captain Ahab, roaming the seas in search not of a whale, but a great white sex organ. Which she will do battle with, grapple and so forth.

The scene in the second act, where Michael Taylor's design has turned the stage into Nirvana's malachite palace and she describes her film's climax to an awestruck Jerry, is a scene rich in the mad exaggerations typical of Kopit. The title of his first play, 30 years ago, was similarly extraordinary: Oh Dad, Poor Dad, Mamma's Hung You in the Closet and I'm Feeling So Sad.

That play was also blisteringly serious, and so is the intention of his latest, but when all is said and, er, done it is a simple story extravagantly packaged. Those metaphors of abasement and sacrifice, in becoming real actions, turn into metaphors again, for the same dehumanising states.

But if the content falls short of satisfying, the performances are vividly colourful in Justin Greene's smooth, swift production, in which monstrous demands are made to seem, by an awful logic, natural deeds if wealth is the only criterion of worth.

Stephen Frost and Maggie Norris are a ferocious pair of hustlers, Tara Hugo is the loopy star, and Lou Hirsch gives an engagingly funny portrait of a man swinging between denial and desire. Now aghast at the threat to his manhood — "This day is actually getting worse" — now falling back on the malachite steps, giggling hysterically at the discovery that, in his crazy world, worst equals best.

Regicide of all the Russias

PETER CHRISTOPHER

Nicholas and Alexandra met as teenagers in 1884 at the Great Palace, Peterhof, built by Peter the Great in imitation of Versailles

THE ROMANOVS
The Final Chapter
By Robert K. Massie
Jonathan Cape, £17.95

TSAR
The Lost World of Nicholas and Alexandra
By Peter Kurth
Little, Brown. £35

THE FALL OF THE ROMANOVS
By Mark Steinberg and Vladimir Khrustalev
Yale, £18.50

Beware regimes that are nice. It usually means that they are just hopelessly inefficient, as Tsar Nicholas II was. For fear of criticism, whether for idleness or extravagance, he did his own secretarial work: licking the stamps, wrapping the gum-paper round parcels, etc. This, he thought, would constitute "work" in the eyes of the very critical, sniggering educated classes, who said in any case that Russia did not need a limited monarchy: she already had a limited monarchy. So, taking more and more power into nerveless hands, Nicholas II marched dutifully on to the disaster of 1917, and the horrible death of himself, his wife, his four daughters, his sick son, the nanny, and even the little boy's dog, at the hands of drunken provincial Communists in a far-away town on the edges of Siberia.

His gruesome end has a gruesome finale: the digging-up of remains from assorted holes in the earth; the sending of samples for DNA testing with British relatives; the final disproving (for such it has to be) of claims that there were any survivors of the massacre; and, perhaps in the not too distant future, a burial of the Tsar's remains in the Romanov crypt in the church of the Peter-Paul Fortress in St Petersburg. The Queen will be asked to attend, but I hope that she will just support those more modest Russian souls who would rather have the Tsar's end commemorated with a simple ceremony at a simple church, now rebuilt, in Yekaterinburg, where they were all slaughtered. Russians are not very good at simple ceremonies, but in this case they need to be encouraged.

Robert Massie made his reputation with Nicholas and Alexandra, a study of the two principals in the end of the Romanov dynasty. He has written a decent account of the rediscovery of the remains, the searches for bones, the identification of the slaughtered children, and his story remains horrible. Richard Pipes, in writing his recent account of the Bolshevik Revolution, devoted several pages to this, and quite right, too: a revolution that begins with the approval of its leader for the murder of children makes its character clear from the outset. The massacre was botched: bullets bounced off corsages that were reinforced by hidden jewels, so bayonets had to be used to finish the job, and the invalid Tsarevich was murdered along with his siblings. Many other members of the family were butchered; the survivors spread around the globe, most of them, so far as I can judge, thriving rather better than did the Habsburgs — admittedly, a much larger family, but one with its due share of drug addicts and black sheep. Massie writes very well, and takes the right advice (he has used William Clark's remarkable Lost Treasures of the Romanovs to effect) and this book is a proper, if harrowing, pendant to his earlier books on the Romanovs.

Tsar is an excellently produced volume of little-known archive photographs and new ones by Peter Christopher, with text by Peter Kurth. Tsarist St Petersburg has enormous appeal: an undergraduate of mine, Jonathan Hill, once remarked that it was a combination of "Wedgwood and cardboard". The Russia-hating Marquis de Custine called it "a monument that the Russians have put up to their future greatness", and he was right. I remember going round the Winter Palace nearly 25 years ago with a student — now Professor Dominic Lieven of the LSE — and saying in my Scottish way: "I wonder how much this cost." I have seen the text of this kind of book better done — Cloe Obolensky and Max Hayward's Russian Empire is unbeatable — but the illustrations, never, and I salivate at them.

Mark Steinberg, with a Russian collaborator from the archives, has produced a volume of documents about the last days of the Tsar. It is competently introduced, with an account of the last Tsar's character, and his bullying German wife. The documents speak for themselves, as the Bolsheviks, from top to bottom, devote themselves to the destruction of the Romanov family.

There is a remarkable novel on the Revolution, Solzhenitsyn's Red Wheel, written in numerous volumes and with obsessive detail in the author's seclusion in Vermont. It is not very widely read, in part because of Solzhenitsyn's one-man crusade to purify the language by reintroducing archaisms (and sometimes inventing them). A Russian friend told me that he only knew of two readers of the work — me, and the author's mother-in-law. It is difficult even for a Solzhenitsyn to work up much sympathy for the royal victims of "revolutionary situations". But with Nicholas II, Massie succeeds.

Ghoulish guru of the Surrealists

John Weightman

REVOLUTION OF THE MIND
The Life of André Breton
By Mark Polizzotti
Bloomsbury. £25

Surrealism, looked at from a distance, seems an exciting phenomenon, full of exotic personalities who were active in literature, painting, the theatre and the cinema, not only in France but also elsewhere. Consequently, one would expect the biography of André Breton, its chief begetter and self-appointed guardian, to be a stimulating story. Instead, these 600 pages have left me sunk in gloom. It is not the fault of the author, who has researched his subject with great care and lays out the facts impartially; what depresses is the spectacle of so much philosophical muddle, such monstrous egotism and repeated outpourings of bile instead of thought. Breton is certainly unique in one respect: he quarrelled, and quarrelled nastily, with more fellow writers and artists than any other literary figure has ever done. There is something sad and ridiculous about the holder of such a record.

Although, since 1988, he has been consecrated by admission to the Gallimard Pléiade series of French classics, Breton (1896-1966) was not primarily a writer. He was more of an animateur, a guru with powerful if fitful aura, who needed to feed on other people.

His aim, he said, was not to write poetry but to live it. He would assiduously woo anyone who might help to that end, only to reject these soul-mates as soon as their personalities ceased to fit comfortably under his own. He must have had a mesmeric quality that worked through personal contact, but is not perceptible in his writings. His books, with the exception of the semi-fictional Nadja, his only work to have had any general appeal, strike me as very disappointing; and even Nadja ends with the typically pompous but meaningless assertion: La beauté sera convulsive ou elle ne sera pas.

He abominated the Catholicism of his pious mother, yet he behaved like a religious leader. He needed to commune daily with his band of followers, whose discussions and Surreal activities he supervised with jealous care. He has often been called the Pope of Surrealism: I see him rather as being, on the one hand, a John the Baptist, perpetually announcing a divine advent that never materialised and, on the other, a Chief Inquisitor rooting out heretics. Since he himself was the changeable author of the dogma, he could scent a heresy at any moment: as a result, the membership of his little church was always in process of change.

The negative aspect of his doctrine was a radical intensification of the rebellious strain endemic in French culture since the 19th century. Conventional French society was to be rejected en bloc as spiritually dead and oppressive; literature was to be damned as a bourgeois survival; language itself, a bourgeois mental prison, needed to be disrupted. This did not at first involve commitment to political action, although it later led to byzantine wrangles with the Communist Party and to the defection of Aragon, the apostate most fiercely reviled by Breton. Breton himself had no aptitude for politics; he wanted "a revolution of the mind".

This meant getting rid of the Graeco-Latin inheritance as being too subservient to reason; escaping from rationality into the unconscious through "automatic writing"; looking for signs and portents and going as far as possible into insanity through hypnotically-induced delirium. We might say that he had rejected the concept of God, but was searching inside the human head for a paradoxical entity, the immanent transcendent, which would be the true poetic experience.

GUILLAUME APOLLINAIRE
LE
Poète assassiné

Le Poète Assassiné* by Breton's hero Apollinaire, in Creating French Culture (Yale, £45)

We might also say that if the experience of the immanent transcendent were possible, man would be God, which is another paradox.

Needless to say, Breton did not become God, and the games he played with his followers now seem childish, although there was one suicide and more than one case of mental derangement. Breton himself was surprisingly prudent, as Polizzotti points out: "It was as if he were forever standing on the edge of a precipice, applauding those who had jumped or had had the good fortune to fall; scorning those who held back; himself unable to take the final step."

Similarly, while condemning other people for accepting social compromises, he appears to have lived largely at the expense of others: his parents, his first wife and bourgeois or aristocratic patrons. In the end, he solicited government-sponsored lecture tours and, far from preaching the disruption of languge, worried about the mistakes in his daughter's French. All in all, then, a very fallible human being, but I suppose we have to agree that, in some mysterious way, he served as a catalyst, whose effect, for good or ill, is still detectable today.

THE HABSBURGS
By Andrew Wheatcroft

COURT, CLOISTER AND CITY
The Art and Culture of Central Europe 1450-1800
By Thomas DaCosta Kaufmann
Weidenfeld & Nicolson. £25

The traditional British view of the Habsburgs is suffused with a nostalgic glow that defies historical analysis. They are considered to be the grandest European dynasty, when in fact they are parvenus next to the Capetians. They are believed to have been great patrons of the arts, when almost every elector of the empire they epitomised created more beauty than they did. They are felt to have been civilised and benevolent when in effect their rule was stupidly severe, occasionally lapsing into brutish savagery. The consequence of this is the ludicrous opinion, voiced half-seriously but persistently, that the cure for the problems of Central Europe is the re-establishment of the Habsburg Empire. This ignores the fact that most of the problems in Central Europe were created by Habsburg rule, whose vicious logic required that all subject peoples should be encouraged to hate each other.

Andrew Wheatcroft's new book therefore set various alarm bells ringing in this reviewer's mind, particularly when the last illustration proved to be a photograph of a grinning Dr Otto von Habsburg (son of the last Emperor, Karl, and present family head) surrounded by his brood. But Wheatcroft sets our mind at ease. "I do not want to fall into the trap of monarchist sycophancy," he declares; he is at heart a "Red".

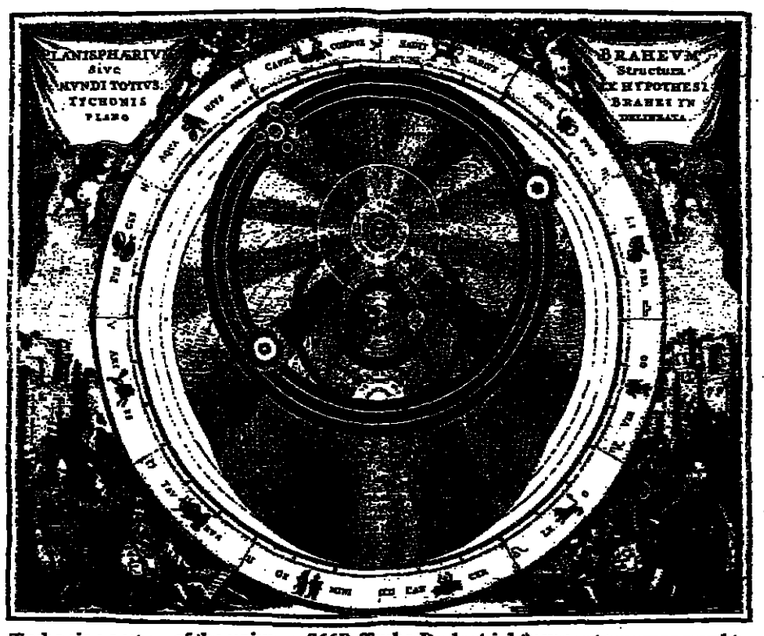

The only red thing about the first hundred pages or so are the graphic descriptions of endless battles, complete with specifications as to what a Swiss pike could do to a head or neck. Things get blacker when he moves on to what he calls "the Habsburgs' invisible power". He rightly focuses on the Habsburgs' self-invented image and dynastic mythology. But he fails to relate it to other mythologies and imageries; every dynasty since ancient times has been at it. And he does not fit this image-building and rebuilding to the ventures, the failures and policy changes which it was called upon to dress up.

There is no real sense here of that extraordinary bid for supremacy which singles out the Habsburgs. Three centuries of manoeuvres, marriages and wars to lever rivals out of Italy and do the Luxemburgs and the Jagiellons out of their land do not get the attention they deserve. Nor does Philip II's heroic failure to bring this country into his grasp. Had his marital plans or his naval ventures worked out, the sun might never have set on the Habsburg Empire.

After that, the Habsburg story is one of hanging on, with increasing desperation. At the beginning of the 18th century the Bourbons stripped them of Spain and its empire. A century later Napoleon forced Francis II of the Holy Roman Empire to restyle himself Francis I of Austria. They hung on for another century, trapped within an aberrant philosophy of their own invention, a "system" that had become an end rather than a means. The means required to keep it going grew increasingly unpleasant beneath a sugary gloss of operettas and waltzes. They included gratuitous cruelty to Italian liberals, bestial treatment of Hungary in 1848 and the refinement of rewarding Ruthene peasants for the severed heads of liberal nobles in Galicia.

Yet many remain fascinated by the fate of this dynasty and feel affected by its downfall. Tragedy there certainly was, even if it was the consequence of the Habsburgs' own imbecility. And it is easier to convey the tragedy of the uncomprehending Habsburg emperor of Mexico, Maximilian, facing a firing-squad at Querétaro in 1867, than that of the thousands of anonymous Mexican peasants he had butchered. It is all a question of taste.

The region in which the Habsburgs' legacy has been most keenly debated is, of course, Central Europe. Thomas DaCosta Kaufmann's Court, Cloister and City considers early modern Central Europe as a single cultural entity. He defines it as the area of the Holy Roman Empire under the Habsburgs, plus the two kingdoms of Poland and Hungary. These lands were bound by dynastic interconnection and a shared religious culture — and not least by a certain sense of insecurity which made them cling to the spiritual legacy of Rome with exaggerated tenacity. The area was (and is) inhabited by extraordinarily varied ethnic groups which sought a common identity in this tradition.

Tychonian system of the universe (1661): Tycho Brahe (right) was astronomer royal to the Habsburg Emperor Rudolf II; from Carole Stott's Celestial Charts (Studio £12.99)

Kaufmann's temporal parameters are judicious. He begins at the moment when the Renaissance penetrated the area, reaffirming that Roman legacy just as the Reformation was about to shatter the original, religious, unity. He ends with the dissolution of the Holy Roman Empire and the Polish Commonwealth, ushering in the age of nationalism, which overrode this shared legacy.

The intellectual climates created by the age of nationalism wreaked havoc with the study of the area's cultural history, as cohorts of professorial beards and glinting spectacles took up their positions on the cultural battlefield, and proceeded to churn out specious arguments claiming artists and scientists for their own nation. Kaufmann slays many of the preposterous old dragons bred by nationalism. He is at his best when he questions the "Germanness", both physical and inspirational, of such contentious figures as Veit Stoss and Albrecht Dürer.

Kaufmann is good on the movement of artists and their influences. The Renaissance influences that reached Muscovy (which he confusingly refers to as "Russia" in the 1450s) collided with a cultural context that blocked their further development. Yet in Hungary, Poland and southern Germany, they met with cultural traditions which allowed them to evolve further.

He displays impressive scholarship and an astonishing grasp of material. Only I cannot help feeling that he has taken on too much. He is very sound on southern Germany and the Bohemia of Rudolf II, somewhat shakier on Hungary, Poland and Russia. This imbalance accords ill with the professed aim of the book. If Central Europe is to be considered "as a cultural entity", then a given theme must be traced right across it. Kaufmann is too academic to pick out salient areas and to generalise outrageously on others. He keeps his enthusiasm under control and tries to be scrupulously fair to both sides of every coin. This makes for dense prose and renders the book less enjoyable than it should be. It is still a considerable achievement.

Robert Skidelsky recalls the SDP, which tried to break the mould of British politics but chose the wrong man to do it

Claret, sweat and tears

David Owen and Roy Jenkins at the 1981 Warrington by-election: when Jenkins resigned and Owen became leader, the party was too little and he was too late

The Social Democratic Party buzzed like a bee in the 1980s and then expired, leaving many shattered hopes and broken careers. It started on March 26, 1981, as a breakaway of 14 (eventually 28) MPs from a suicidally left-wing Labour Party. The "Alliance" it formed with the Liberal Party won 25.4 per cent of the vote in the 1983 general election, with 23.1 per cent in 1987.

But under our "first past the post" system, its parliamentary reward was meagre. After 1987 there were only five SDP MPs. In 1988 part of the SDP merged with the Liberals; the rest continued as a separate party under David Owen till he wound it up in 1990. The only obvious political legacy of the SDP was to make the successor party, the Liberal Democrats, "more managerial and disciplined".

That, at any rate, is the conclusion of this often gripping, but far from authoritative study of the "birth, life and death of the SDP", written by two political scientists from Essex University. It alternates between entertaining chapters of gossip and sober chapters of organisational and electoral analysis. But essential parts of the context are left out. The SDP was ready for the weakness of Labour, not for the strength of Thatcherism. Almost immediately, the question of its positioning in relation to the "Thatcher revolution" became critical to its ability to win and hold seats. Remove this political context and the quarrels within the SDP about how close to get to the Liberals and much else are inevitably reduced to a clash of personalities, with David Owen in his familiar role of wrecker.

SDP: The Birth, Life and Death of the Social Democratic Party
By Ivor Crewe and Anthony King
OUP, £25

The portrait of Owen is pure caricature. Owen is difficult. He appears here, at best, as a smouldering volcano, always on the verge of eruption: at worst, as an egomaniac. His generosity of spirit, his real interest in ideas, his sense of strategic direction are ignored. He was consistent in wanting to keep the SDP separate from the Liberals. This was the root of his estrangement from Bill Rodgers and Shirley Williams, who felt increasingly comfortable in the Liberal home (Roy Jenkins did so from the start). Whether the kind of SDP Owen wanted could have put down roots in the early 1980s is the major untested proposition because such an SDP never emerged.

For this there were two main reasons. The first is that the breakaway party, looking back to a consensual, corporatist past, was slow to get the measure of the 1980s. As a result you had the paradox of a new party with nothing new to say. This was not true of Owen. He started advocating a "social market economy" in May 1981 — a fact Crewe and King omit. This, together with his strong support for the Falklands War and the retention of Britain's nuclear deterrent, pointed to a patriotic, market-based party with generous social instincts. But there was little support from Jenkins, Rodgers and Williams for such a semi-Thatcherite package. For them, Thatcher was still the Devil incarnate.

Other potential gains were unexploited. Crewe and King show that 53 per cent of SDP activists had been to grammar school, and 70 per cent of Alliance voters (as well as 84 per cent of Tory and 57 per cent of Labour voters) wanted grammar schools restored. Yet the SDP was far too cautious to break out into such politically incorrect terrain. Thatcher was always one step ahead. The SDP's curse was to be supported by too many of the bien pensants.

The other reason for the SDP's failure to develop a separate identity was that it was captured by Roy Jenkins and the Liberal leader David Steel, who saw a chance to bring an Alliance government quickly to power on a wave of popular disenchantment with "extremism". This strategy was just plausible in the autumn of 1981, when opinion polls showed 50 per cent popular support for the Liberals and SDP. Why did it persist when Alliance support started to crumble in 1982?

The short answer is that Shirley Williams shirked the Warrington by-election of June 1981, which she probably would have won and which would have made her leader of the SDP. Jenkins stepped in, reduced Labour's majority from 10,274 to 1,759, and by his "reluctant boldness" became the automatic choice as SDP leader when he returned to Parliament as MP for Hillhead in March 1982.

Jenkins was older than the others and badly wanted to be Prime Minister. He was committed to the strategy of a single push and for that he needed the Liberals; Steel, in turn, needed the SDP to break out of the Liberals' Celtic-fringe-cum-community-politics ghetto. Crewe and King concede that Jenkins's 11-month leadership of the SDP was a disaster. They do not mention that Williams's decision not to contest Warrington was taken "largely on the advice of Tony King, the Professor of Politics at Essex University and a close friend" (David Owen, Time to Declare, page 520.)

In a sense, the SDP's death started before it had begun to live: it was strangled at birth. Between 1983 and 1987 the midget party was kept alive only by the outsize personality and appeal of Owen. By the time he and the "continuing SDP" were able to free themselves from the Liberal embrace in 1988, it was too late, and perhaps he had lost interest.

Should Jenkins, Owen, Rodgers and Williams have stayed on, to "fight and fight again" in the Labour Party? Loyalty is a great political virtue. But the amount of lying and self-abasement required of right-wing Labour politicians by 1980 went far beyond the call of party duty. Do we admire Healey and Hattersley for their broken-backed response to Tony Benn's takeover bid? I don't think so. Nor did it do them any good.

Is it really true that "almost no trace of the SDP" is to be found in contemporary British politics? The emergence of Tony Blair's "new Labour", we are told, "owed almost nothing to the SDP"; the Tories were "almost wholly unaffected" by it. The arguments supporting these dogmatic assertions are flimsy. If Crewe and King had followed the trail of ideas, rather than of political corpses, they would have found many traces; and some of the bodies they have not noticed are starting to appear in places where they have not deigned to look.

The meritocracy and its Maecenas

Prescriptions for social and economic advance either tend towards the belief that less should be expected of government and more of individual aspirations, or hold that tuning the instruments of the State best promotes the common good. The youthful Michael Young spent a formative and successful period in the latter camp, drafting the Labour Party's manifesto for the 1945 election and heading its research department throughout the years of its implementation.

He was frustrated, however, by the dynamics of the mainstream political process, and embarked on a "third road". Since then, in dozens of ways, he has shown that the scope for making a difference to society is just as wide outside government as within it.

Now, as Lord Young of Dartington, he has just turned 80, and an illustrious selection of the hundreds of people with whom he has collaborated pays tribute to him in this collection of essays on his life and work. He is not a household name, partly because of his lack of interest in self-promotion; and yet he is undoubtedly one of the pre-eminent figures of the postwar period. His roles as thinker, researcher, reformer and entrepreneur bind these disparate items together.

Great and good: Lord Young of Dartington

All his life, Young's work has been grounded in Utopianism, which makes it ironic that the most important exposition of his ideas, The Rise of the Meritocracy, is a satirical and dystopian vision, described in Daniel Bell's essay as "one of the most imaginative social-science fictions of the 20th century". But his theory is carefully mapped on to the real world, and as several contributors comment, Young staunchly refuses to let abstract sociological models deflect from his own understanding of everyday life. W.G. Runciman and others show how this is reflected in his research methods, where his gift for drawing out interviewees is the foundation for vivid and penetrating analyses of social conditions in his books, such as Family and Kinship in East London.

Young has never been content to wait for the slow-burning impact of his thinking to reach practical realisation through public policy. Armed by his preoccupations with disadvantage, the family, the consumer and lifelong learning, he has devoted most of his energy during the past half-century to spawning new organisations. Name a social invention of the last 40 years and it is likely that he thought of it, pushed for it, or set it up. The early chapters cover many of these, among them the Consumers' Association and the Open University. The book is also littered with testimonies to Young's extraordinary abilities as a fundraiser, a businessman and a developer of the talents of others.

What could have been a mere panoply of praise is spiced by the variety of Young's career, a career which has earned its eulogies despite the fact that it isn't even over yet: he is still active, writing, and establishing new initiatives, most recently for the promotion of distance learning in southern Africa. He remains, too, a learner himself: Tessa Blackstone offers an amusing account of Young's simultaneous incumbency as President and student of Birkbeck College.

Two questions remain: what motivates such relentless energy, and how did his rare attributes emerge? Vincent Brome recalls a journey with Young on which they discussed whether the satisfactions of altruism were "so deep that they far outreached those of selfishness". Another contributor to this excellent festschrift, Asa Briggs, who is writing Young's biography, may provide some answers.

JUNK MAIL
By Will Self
Bloomsbury, £12.99

WILL SELF prefaces his latest book, a collection of journalism, with the candid admission that it "represents the fruit of being prepared to do more or less what any editor asks me to do". Despite such pliancy in the face of editorial demands, Self is confident that the articles he has chosen to reprint here fall safely on the right side of Cyril Connolly's celebrated distinction: between journalism, that which should be read only once, and literature, that which can sustain repeated viewing. At times, Self's various newspaper and magazine editors wanted book reviews, at others, longer profiles or travel pieces. But there was surprising consistency in how they used Self: he was their man for anything to do with drugs.

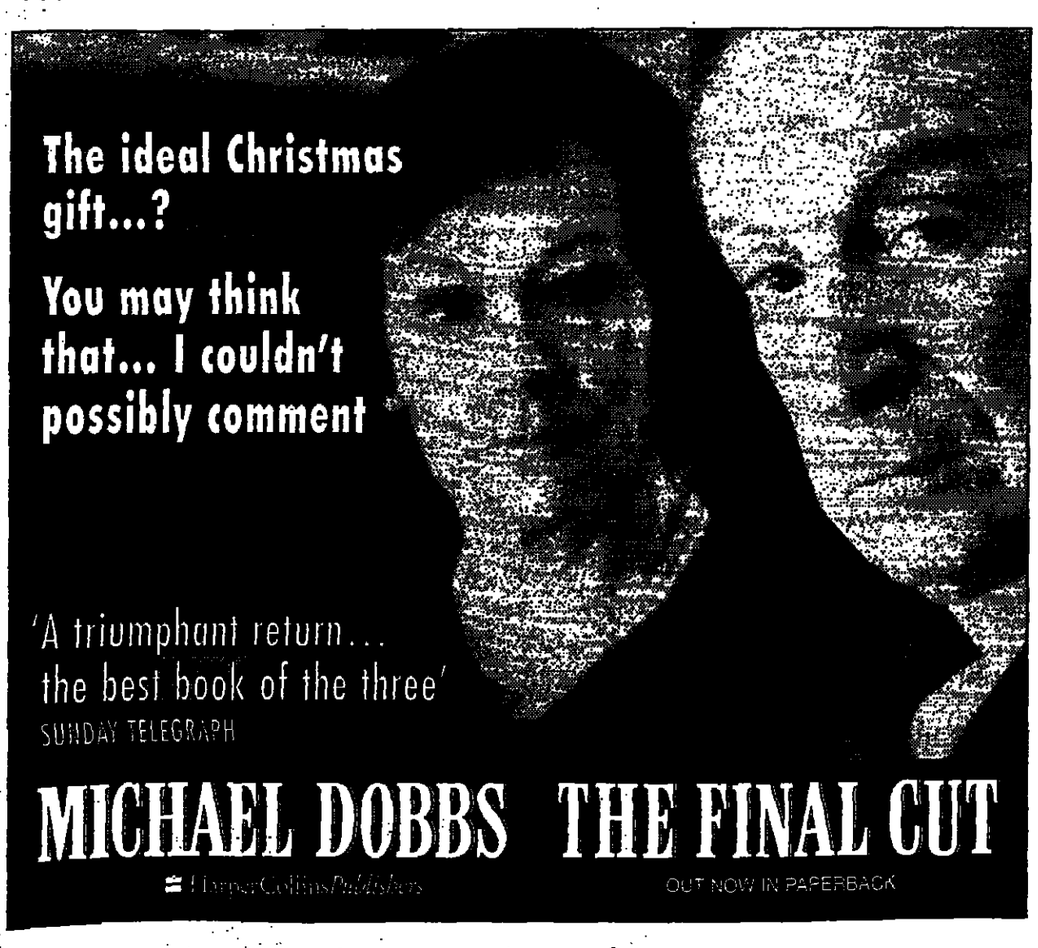

The enthusiasm for sending Self out to cover drug stories is explained by another of his candid admissions. "I grew up on drugs," he tells us, "By the time I was 15, I was a daily drug user . . . Speed and dope; and then heroin when I was 17." Though such habits should in no way influence our view of him as a writer, Self is subtle in allowing for the possibility that it generally does. He explains that drugs have had an unfortunate tendency to be equated with art as a symbol of creativity — a writer known to be drug user has, in our culture, an aura out of reach to one who simply likes elderflower cordial.

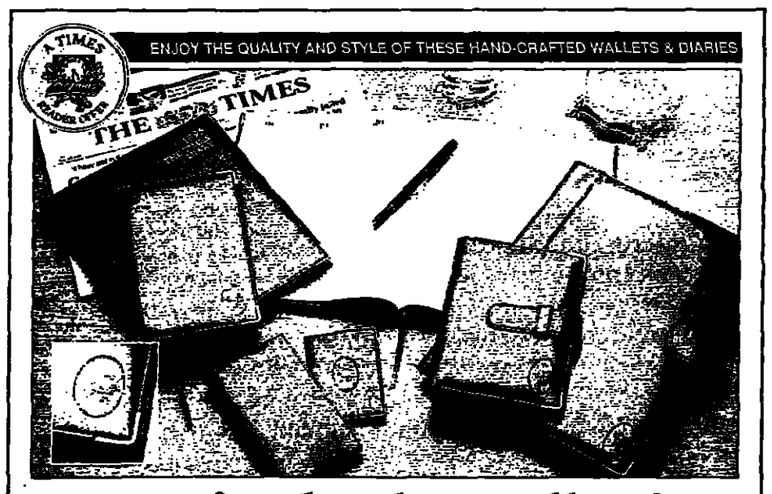

But Self wants it both ways. The title and arrangement of this collection draws attention to addiction, but he is impatient with non-drug users' ghoulish interest in narcotics. At the end of a piece about London drug dealers, Self rounds on his unaddicted commuter readers: "You don't want to stay in the drug zone, do you? No, I didn't think so. Turn the page, get on with the next article, go home."

IF SELF is so irritated, it is because he knows how seductive and yet perilous the image of drugs can be. In articles on William Burroughs, he deplores the way in which Burroughs's qualities as a writer have been confused in the popular imagination with his drug use. Those encouraged to take drugs by Burroughs failed to realise the distinction between writing the life of a junkie and living it, which explains why Burroughs is still alive and many of his fans are not. Self was once a victim of such confusion, believing that "if you were a hard drug addict, you were an underground writer, of necessity . . . I felt very cheated when I woke up at the age of 21 with a bad heroin habit, in complete obscurity."

Self still feels that drug use should have a place in our culture, but sadly his enthusiasm for developing his ideas on the topic has an unfortunate tendency to flag, so that the reader ends up having little trouble agreeing with him when, rather surprisingly, he sides with Thomas Szasz's view that the debate on drugs is ultimately boring.

The rest of this collection meanders cheerfully over a range of topics: there is a piece on Self's enthusiasm for driving on motorways, another on flying first class to New York, another about getting a cyst removed from his penis. The prose alternates between machismo and erudition. With such honesty in admitting to the origins of this collection, it would be churlish to fault Junk Mail according to literary standards. It offers no more and no less than a good Sunday paper arts section.

Santa's grotto flights restart

BY TONY DAWE

THE rush is on to see Santa Claus in his grotto, not in the nearest city centre store, but in the Arctic wastes of Lapland. Record numbers of British tourists are expected to fly to Finland in the next three weeks for short visits that include a meeting with Santa.

Transun Holidays is organising charter flights to Rovaniemi from 23 UK airports starting on December 9 with day trips from Birmingham, Bristol, Cardiff, Exeter, Glasgow and Jersey. The cost varies between £179 and £199 per person, depending on the departure airport, and includes coach transfers to Santa's village to see his workshop and post office. Transun took 3,500 visitors to Lapland last year and hopes for more than 4,000 this year.

Cosmos has pulled out of the day-trip market but expects to take 2,000 tourists on four-to-six day visits, from £569 per person, to Levi, served by the less crowded Arctic Circle airport of Kittila.

"We have found that people are prepared to pay a little more for a longer stay which will give them the chance to take snowmobile and husky safaris or go skiing," says Barbara Kurau, of Cosmos.

Cheaper stays are available: Superlative Travel, of west London, offers four days in Lapland from December 11 for £299 per person. British Airways started the ball rolling on Tuesday by taking more than 100 mainly disadvantaged children on a day trip to Rovaniemi aboard a new Boeing 777.

Finnair will operate 21 scheduled services from Heathrow to Rovaniemi in December compared with five last year.

"The Santa business is booming," says Ulla Pakarinen, the Finnish Tourist Board's UK director. "We are attracting visitors from Japan and the Far East and several European countries, including France, but the largest number come from Britain. We are expecting 12,000 in December, which would be double the figure two years ago. Many parents regard the trip as a Christmas present for their children and are staying longer so they can all enjoy the adventure programmes."

Most holidays over Christmas are sold out, adds Mrs Pakarinen, because Lapland offers "a traditional Christmas with the perfect setting, a real winter wonderland".

Fly-and-buy boom

BY HARVEY ELLIOTT

THOUSANDS of cost-conscious travellers are cutting their Christmas shopping bills by ordering tax-free presents by telephone which they collect before boarding their jets at Britain's biggest airports.

BAA, the airport operator which runs Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted, claims that its free personal shopping service is now being used by more than 150 customers a week and that the number is growing rapidly.

At least 15 high street retailers are now operating in each of the terminals, offering reductions of about 15 per cent on the normal price of popular products.

BAA makes more money from its shops than from landing fees. And despite the introduction of the airport departure tax, the number of flights and passengers is growing inexorably.

Popular high street stores such as Dixons, HMV, Austin Reed, Tie Rack, Liberty and Burberry are among dozens cashing in on this captive audience and the boom in airport trading.

BAA guarantees that all prices quoted by retailers granted franchises to open their doors at the airport will be at least free of VAT. Often prices are well below the VAT-free level and the demand for bargains has been so great that BAA has opened a booking service enabling canny shoppers to order by phone in advance and collect their purchases as they pass through the airport.

Business travellers in a hurry are among the most frequent users of the service because, they claim, it is a way of using up "dead time" spent at the airport.

Last week alone, BAA's shopping "consultants" — specialist advisers who either take orders by telephone in advance then have the goods ready when the passenger arrives at the airport, or who guide shoppers in person around the stores — took orders for three Rolex watches, a facsimile machine and a $10,000 uncut diamond, which was to be used in an engagement ring in America.

Though the average saving on tax-free goods is about 15 per cent, the price reductions on duty-free items such as drink is even greater. Most popular brands of spirits are now half the price of those in high street shops, enabling regular travellers to cash in even more on the windfall offered at the airports.

This week's Budget will mean that the average high street price of a litre bottle of spirits will fall by 36p, once retailers have sold their existing stock. BAA officials said yesterday they were planning to introduce comparative price cuts.

The European Union and British Customs have, however, pledged to wind up duty and tax-free sales within the next three years, ending the Christmas shopping bonanzas for travellers.

Duty-free cut sparks chaos

HORDES of Channel Tunnel "booze train" passengers are besieging Eurotunnel duty-free shops after the company announced it was cutting the price of its spirits and cigarettes by a third, Jonathan Prynn writes.

Thousands of Christmas bargain hunters, many of them on day-return coach outings through the tunnel, are queueing for up to three hours amid chaotic scenes at the Eurotunnel terminals in Folkestone and Calais.

Other passengers, hoping to use Le Shuttle as the fast way to drive to France, have complained about missing appointments after being caught up in the maelstrom at the terminal shopping areas and their car parks.

Gillie Coghlan, 41, a financial analyst from Oxford, said she was late for an important business lunch in France after she visited the duty-free shop at the Folkestone terminal earlier this month.

"The queue to get into the shop was 100 yards long and six people wide," she said. "I could not get anywhere near the counter." After abandoning the plan to buy duty-free, Mrs Coghlan returned to her car but was unable to get out of the car park for two hours. On her return to England she was told that there would also be a two-hour wait at the duty-free shop in the Calais terminal.

The duty-free reductions, combined with the current special winter fares on Le Shuttle trains, mean that the potential savings can easily cover the cost of a trip. A party of four adults travelling by car could make a total saving of more than £200 compared with high street prices by making full use of their spirit and tobacco duty-free allowances. A mid-week day-return ticket for a car and passengers costs £39.

A spokeswoman for Eurotunnel, which cut 33 per cent off its duty-free alcohol and tobacco products last month, said extra tills were being installed at the shops to cope with the surge in demand. In the meantime, jazz bands, jugglers and clowns were being laid on to keep the queues entertained while they waited, she said. Last Friday, a record 6,900 vehicles, including hundreds of coaches, were carried on the Channel Tunnel trains.

"Passengers are being advised at that there are queues at the duty-free shops and if they want to get to France in a hurry they should go straight on to their trains," she said.

A spokeswoman for Eurotunnel said its duty-free prices would not be affected by the Budget. Its prices remain £6.35 for a litre of Gordon's gin compared with £10 for the normal duty-free price, £6.65 for a litre of Bell's Scotch compared with £10.95 previously, and £10 for 200 Marlboro cigarettes compared with £14.75 before.

A bit dog eared

Last week's heart-warming story of Louise, the tiny shih-tzu dog rescued from the overheated cargo hold of a BA jet after 208 passengers agreed to a lengthy and costly diversion, has a thought-provoking sub-plot.

Louise's owner is Irene Saunders, 53, who has decided to live in the Cotswold village of Bourton-on-the-Water. She tells me she fell in love with England during a holiday visit that convinced her to spend her last years in the countryside of Middle England rather than at home in great spaces of Texas. "I am a widow with no family left except this little dog," she says. "I could have lived anywhere in the world, but I chose the Cotswolds because to me they are charming, gentle and welcoming."

Bourton-on-the Water has a population of fewer than 3,000 and yet attracts some two million visitors a year. At least 40 per cent of the foreign tourists who are disgorged from their coaches at the village green are from the United States.

So great is the popularity of

HARVEY ELLIOTT

Bourton that it has come to be regarded among economists and sociologists as the perfect example of a "positional good" — something which loses its status or value when it becomes accessible to all.

I hope, therefore, that Mrs Saunders settles happily in Bourton and is not disappointed as she begins to realise that it may have lost much of its intrinsic charm and quintessential Englishness because of mass international tourism. Surprisingly, research indicates she may just be lucky.

The Cotswold District Council carried out a survey of both visitors to, and residents of, Bourton to try to establish how they might live in harmony. "The view has sometimes been expressed that there are too many visitors to Bourton and a need to introduce controls to try to reduce the numbers," said its report.

"Yet two out of three visitors interviewed were of the opinion that the level of visitors was not too high and only 12 per cent of the remaining third said that it had spoilt their visit.

"It appears that from the visitors' point of view Bourton offers all the features that we would wish to be seen as indicative of the Cotswolds rather than a village that has lost some of its character through commercialisation of tourism — yet the more crowded it becomes the less able they are to appreciate it."

Local residents, on the other hand, thought there were too many tourists who were bringing it "downmarket"; were worried about the litter; and felt the village was "not flourishing, merely surviving".

Oman out to lure UK tourists

By Harvey Elliott

ONE OF Arabia's most spectacular, but least known, countries is dipping its toe into the international tourism market — 25 years after it first emerged from centuries of isolation.

As Jeremy Hanley, the Foreign Office minister, discovered this week when he paid an official visit to Oman on its quarter century, the Sultanate is trying to wean itself from a dependence on oil. Now Oman has decided to develop new industries to cushion the blow when the oil starts to run out.

But though 30 new tourism developments, including a luxury yachting marina, are under way, in the short term a shortage of hotel beds, together with a conservative attitude towards tourists, means that the growth will not be rushed.

Two of Oman's biggest hotels, the award-winning Al Bustan Palace and the Intercontinental, are closing their doors next week so that Oman can host the summit conference for the six countries in the Gulf Co-operation Council. Regional concerns continue to take priority over the needs of the small but fast-growing groups of tourists arriving in Muscat, the capital, even if this means that 500 of the best hotel rooms in the region are temporarily out of bounds.

When the Anglophile Sultan Qaboos Bin Said, English-educated and a graduate of Sandhurst, ousted his repressive father in 1970, there were only ten kilometres of asphalt roads in the whole country. Now there are 7,000. There were three schools and 900 students in a nation of more than two million. Now there are 900 schools and half a million students. Omanis are gradually replacing the foreign workers who carried out much of the development.

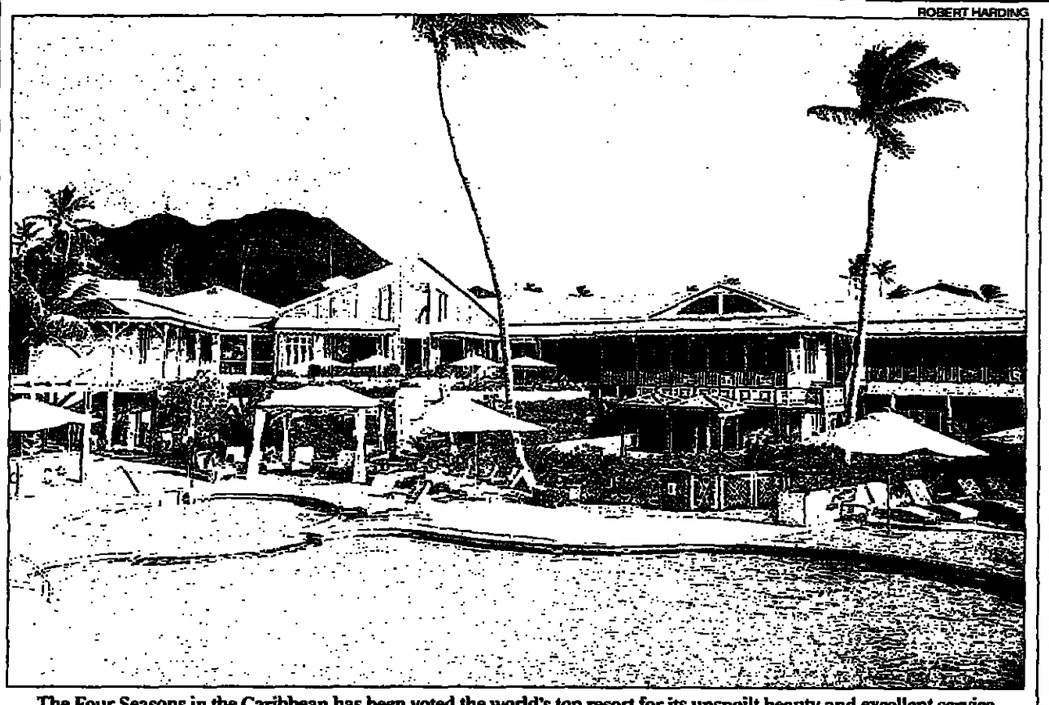

Now private, government-approved tour companies are taking parties of tourists to towering multicoloured mountains, enormous sand dunes, ancient villages, forts and unspoilt oases.

But the Sultan is determined to prevent the new industry from developing too quickly and wants to avoid mass tourism. Because he has concentrated for the past 25 years on building infrastructure, buildings are modern, efficient and pristine. There is little crime, women can walk anywhere without fear of being molested and the begging and aggressive trinket-selling that bedevils much of the Middle East is absent.

The Omanis take a relaxed view of habits such as alcohol, and though there are no streetside bars, hotels and restaurants are well stocked. Women are expected to cover their limbs in public, shorts are frowned upon and only Omanis are allowed to wear the ubiquitous cover-all robe, but there is no hint of fanaticism. Sultan Qaboos said in a recent interview: "There is no place in our religion for extremism in whatever guise, fanaticism of whatever kind and factionalism of whatever persuasion."

For the first time British Airways Holidays are including Oman in their brochures using the new Boeing 777 twin-jet on the route.

Nevis tops resort poll

By Tony Dawe

THE Four Seasons in Nevis, where scores of photographers captured the Princess of Wales splashing in the Caribbean with the young princes, has been voted the world's top resort in the most comprehensive survey of travellers' tastes.

Condé Nast Traveler polled more than 30,000 readers for their views on the best cities, islands, hotels, airlines and resorts and found places as far apart as Aspen and Bangkok winning approval, with honourable mentions for some British hotels.

The Four Seasons outscored many more exclusive destinations to head the list of top 100 resorts, with readers praising its unspoilt beauty and excellent service. The resort sits on a palm-fringed beach with views across a fast-running strait to the undeveloped hills of St Kitts, while behind it rises the tree-clad slopes of the volcanic Mount Nevis.

The resort beat the Inn at Spanish Bay, Pebble Beach, California, and the Ritz-Carlton at Aspen into second and third place. Two hotels in Bangkok, the Shangri-La and redeveloped Oriental on the riverside, were surprise entries in the worldwide top ten, including America. The best-placed European hotel was the Ritz in Paris.

Cunard's Royal Viking cruise ship and the Savoy and Claridge's hotels in London made the top 50, with the Royal Crescent, Bath, finishing at 67 in the table.

Other traditional centres of excellence in the British Isles scored well in the foreign hotels section, with high ratings for Adare Manor in Ireland, Gleneagles and St Andrews Old Course hotels in Scotland and the Lygon Arms in the Cotswolds.

The Hotel de Paris, Monte Carlo, with its Belle Epoque decor, modern art therapy centre and views across the harbour, topped the foreign resorts list, with the Mount Kenya Safari Club second.

When it came to favourite islands, the magazine's American-dominated readership opted for places close to home with the Hawaiian islands of Maui and Kauai in the top three. Bermuda came second, with readers praising its accommodation, people and activities. The Isle of Capri's scenery and environment won special praise but it still did not make the top 20.

While the choice of islands might baffle many British travellers, most would probably support the list of cities with the Pacific Rim and European favourites being rated highly. One disappointment for Anglophiles is that British Airways was squeezed out of the list of top ten airlines, finishing eleventh.

Forte in 45% hotel price cut

By David Churchill

FORTE is cutting the cost of staying at its luxury Paris hotels, including the George V and Plaza Athenee, by up to 45 per cent as a result of sluggish demand caused by the strong franc and terrorist attacks.

The two hotels are among the so-called "trophy" hotels that Granada, which is trying to buy Forte for £3.3 billion, says it will sell off if it succeeds in the takeover. A single room at the Plaza Athenee, for example, will now cost Fr1,200 a room a night, compared to a normal rate of Fr2,300.

The Forte price cuts, which are on offer until next April, are unusual in that they apply all week and not just at weekends when demand is lowest. This reflects the impact that France's recent series of troubles, including this week's industrial unrest, has had on deterring business travellers.

Andrew Duncan, a partner with the hotel consultants Pannell Kerr Forster, says that Parisian hotels are struggling to fill rooms at profitable rates.

"Our research shows that while occupancy rates in the French capital were slowly increasing last year, this was only achieved through sharp discounts. And while occupancy was looking better this year, the market has been hit by incidents which are forcing room rates to be cut again."

But Forte is not alone in trying to stimulate demand in Paris hotels by cutting rates. Concorde Hotels, controlled by the Tattinger champagne family, is also offering savings of between 25 and 35 per cent off published room rates at some of its Paris luxury hotels. And Hyatt and Sheraton are offering reduced weekend rates at their Paris hotels.

Paris Travel Service also has a deal with the Hotel Ritz, excluding Christmas and new year, for a two-night stay at £676 a person, including Eurostar rail travel. This is a saving of £106 a person on the normal short-break price.

Skiers offered smartcard flexibility

By Graham Duffill

AN AUSTRIAN ski resort opens next week with a high-technology lift-ticket system that is likely to become a blueprint for ski resorts around the world, freeing them from traditional constraints and opening them up as winter theme parks.

Bad Kleinkirchheim, in the southern province of Carinthia, has extended the technology that reads smartcards, which let skiers on to the lift, to work in other facilities, such as the swimming pool. Fair-weather skiers or those who want to ski for only a few hours of the day do not then feel they are wasting their costly lift ticket.

Most European resorts now have the technology to "charge" the microchip in a watch or "credit" card with points. Points are then deducted by the lift when the skier passes through. The technology uses radio to "interrogate" the chip from a distance. Watches worn under gloves, or cards kept in pockets, need be within only a metre of a turnstile to open it, reducing the length of lift queues.

Potentially, the new technology will allow lift companies to programme different lifts to take varying numbers of points off the chip, encouraging skiers to avoid peak periods by making them more expensive.

But the ultimate benefit is in allowing the skier to use the lift-pass for other activities.

Wolfgang Eder, tourist director of Bad Kleinkirchheim, or BKK as it is known locally, is trying to persuade winter visitors to look upon the resort as a kind of giant Disney park. "The idea behind it is that people buy one ticket but when the weather is bad, or when they are tired in the afternoon, they use it to go to the spa, or play tennis. There are many people who do not want to ski all day and who want to get good value for money out of their lift ticket. This way you never waste your ticket."

BKK uses the credit card system rather than the wristwatch, and guests can either pay for an all-inclusive ticket for a fixed number of days — this winter it will cost £97 for six days in high season — or pay for the card to be charged with a certain number of points.

The lift pass can be used in the thermal spas, tennis and squash courts, curling rinks and even golf driving range. The system cost BKK £500,000 to install.

Israel signs tourism deal

By Gill Williams

ISRAEL has joined former enemies in a tourism alliance to encourage travel to and between countries of the Middle East.

The Middle East-Mediterranean Travel and Tourism (Memtta) Agreement follows the recent assassination of Israel's Prime Minister, Yitzhak Rabin. Signatories include the Palestinian Authority, Tunisia, Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Turkey and Cyprus.

Israel's Tourism Minister, Uzi Baram, said the killing had strengthened Israel's determination to join the venture. "Rabin became a fighter for peace and, along with Sadat of Egypt, President Kennedy and Gandhi, was killed for those beliefs. The people of Israel will continue to fight for peace.

"We know that tourism co-operation has been the first step towards peace between warring countries. It is the means to create trust between peoples." Egypt and Jordan have become popular holiday destinations for Israelis since entry rules were relaxed two years ago.

Egypt's Tourism Minister, Mamdouh Beltagi, echoed Israeli calls for Lebanon and Syria to join Memtta. "Peace and tourism are twins. Peace is a condition for the flourishing of tourism and tourism creates better conditions for peace."

Israelis are still banned from entering Tunisia, for many years the base of the exiled PLO, but Tunisia promised it would soon relax visa rules to welcome Israeli package holidaymakers.

Cities bid for visitors

By Willy Newlands

THE difficult choices facing industrial cities which want to join the tourist boom — the biggest industry in the world come the millennium — were emphasised at a Cultural Tourism Conference in Illetas, Majorca, which issued the Declaration of Majorca this week.

Some cities want to glory in their smokestack history, others want to move on and forget it as quickly as possible. Each side believes it is doing the right thing culturally.

George Sneddon, of Glasgow's economic department, described "dark despair in the rain" as the city's 17 shipyards were reduced to only two, locomotive works and steelworks closed. The move into tourism was about hope and civic pride, he said.

The city's tourist board was not created until 1984. The event which turned Glasgow around was the opening of the Burrell Collection, a new museum which attracted one million people in a year, and the new hope was summed up in the slogan: Glasgow's Miles Better.

WORLD PICTURES

Glasgow moved into tourism out of hope and civic pride

Mr Sneddon said: "What the city has done is create a new image for itself. We are not concentrating on our past, which left large areas derelict. We have built on our success as City of Culture in 1990. We are saying: our music, our drama are now. Come and join the party."

Lindsay Brooks, from Arts About Manchester, said the city was trying to promote a new image, but within the context of its industrial history — ballets were being staged in settings of old machinery and buildings. Arne Ellefors, from Norrkoping, Sweden, site of a vanished textile industry, said there was a need to create a fashionable image so that people feel a visit is doing something important.

The three cities, with others such as Lille and Bilbao, are developing joint marketing strategies which become eligible for 70 per cent EU funding. More than 600,000 ecus (£500,000) has been earmarked for the promotion.

The session president, Professor Jose Vidal-Beneyto of the European Cultural Agency, said that the main problem facing tourism was not just growth, but also the increasingly passive nature of tourists. "We need to launch those cities which are rich in cultural associations or industrial history, but which are not known to the outside world," he said.

London left to rue preparation

London 32
Western Samoans 40

BY DAVID HANDS
RUGBY CORRESPONDENT

THE good, the bad and the plain indifferent of rugby union, English and Samoan, was laid before a threadbare crowd at Twickenham yesterday. For an hour, the Western Samoans left a lumbering London team stumbling in their wake, yet, by the end, like a boxer on the ropes, they were hanging on grimly for the victory that keeps their tour on course.

The time that it took London to make an impact on the game was roughly the time that it took a reconstructed side to find some element of collective form, and left the team management frustrated at the indecision that surrounds the future of this level of representative rugby. "It's pointless putting out a side which isn't given an opportunity to prepare, not only for its own benefit but for England's," Tony Jorden, the chairman of selectors, said.

London, the first of the divisional teams to play the Samoans in the CIS-sponsored series, seek continuity of fixtures and freedom to select who they will. They are already planning a tour to New Zealand's South Island next summer. "Whatever vehicle is chosen to play against incoming tour sides, it has to be fully supported," Jorden said.

On the day, however, London made too many basic mistakes against light-footed opponents, whose use of space was exemplary and whose fourth try was a marvellous example of team support. It was scored by Lima, his third of the match, and featured Filemu twice before the flying wing cut across the grain of the defence to the posts.

Lima is one of the core players of the new-look Samoan team, along with Pat Lam and To'o Vaega, who are among 23 players who have signed letters of commitment to Samoan rugby. Since the World Cup last summer, they have lost seven players to rugby league, another to Japan, and still more to the temptation of New Zealand contracts. "I believe in the cause, in what we are trying to do for the future of Samoan rugby," Lam, an articulate captain, said.

He led by example at Twickenham. As London fumbled for coherence, Lam's pick-up from a scrum paved the way for Lima's first try, and Lam scored the next himself from a well-worked move with Smith. London's cause was not assisted by the sight of Pears limping off at the interval, the victim of a strained ankle that he hopes will have mended by the weekend.

However, the Harlequins stand-off half had made little impression either on the match or on Jack Rowell, the watching England manager. His kicking, at goal and out of hand, lacked direction, and a potentially bright back division was virtually anonymous, though Pears will have realised that Mensah's damaged shoulder had reduced his effect. The centre might have been better advised to have left the field.

The Samoans sewed the game up in the third quarter. The quick-thinking Lima ripped the ball from a reluctant defender, took a quick tapped penalty and darted over, and though the valuable Leaupepe left with a twisted ankle, Lima crossed for what Bryan Williams, their coach, described as the kind of team try that coaches strive for.

At that stage, London went for broke. Snow, playing perhaps his best representative game, Dallaglio and Dunston led the charge, Watson scored his second try, and Dallaglio, defenders hanging off him, crossed as the Samoans faltered under a deluge of penalties; but the points in their bag were already enough.

Bowring appointed to drive Wales forward

THE post of Wales national coach has become something of a hair shirt, but yesterday Kevin Bowring took up the challenge (David Hands writes). He is the third in eight months, after Alan Davies and Alex Evans, but the first full-time coach employed by the Welsh Rugby Union.

Bowring's appointment, that take him up to the conclusion of the 1999 World Cup in Wales, was inevitable if the coaching structure was to mean anything. He will conclude his present job as director of physical education at Clifton College at the end of this term and take up his new post next month.

The names of Clive Griffiths, who coaches the Wales rugby league team, and Clive John, from Pontypridd, were also considered, but Bowring's solid record of achievement in the past six years, with the Welsh under-20, under-21 and A teams, served to turn his caretaker role against Fiji earlier this month into a permanent appointment.

Bowring, 41, has spent most of his senior career in England. A native of Neath, he was a student at Borough Road College and played as a perceptive No 8 for London Welsh, whom he captained for three years, for nine seasons. He also appeared five times for the Barbarians.

"The post of Welsh coach is probably one of the most professional jobs in world rugby," Bowring said. "It has been an ambition of mine since 1990 and it's an extremely exciting challenge."

Pierre Villepreux will be recommended today for the post of France team manager by André Herrero, who resigned from the role earlier this month. However, the former full back is considered unlikely to receive the support of Bernard Lapasset, the French federation president.

Cottrell hopes to survive injury scare

Cambridge University .. 35
Steele-Bodger's XV..... 29

BY PETER BILLS

STEVE COTTRELL, the New Zealander who is captaining Cambridge University this year, left the field in the second half of this traditional pre-University match fixture with a twisted knee.

Cottrell, who withdrew on the morning of the University match last year, suffered the injury in a tackle 12 minutes into the second half at Grange Road. He hopes that it will not threaten his place at Twickenham.

Cambridge suffered a spate of injuries causing immense disruption, but they were good enough to cope, squeezing home by six points in a thoroughly entertaining game of ten tries. The winning margin was two goals, three tries and two penalty goals to two goals and three tries.

It was always a fast, competitive game and the visitors played their part splendidly. Cambridge deserved great credit for lifting themselves mentally only five days after their fine victory over the Western Samoans, and they looked a quick, neat and organised side with plenty of scoring potential.

GRANGE ROAD DETAILS

SCORERS: Cambridge University: Tries: Maslen (2), Rutter, Ashforth, Sexton. Conversions: Ashforth (2). Penalty goals: Ashforth (2). Steele-Bodger's XV: Tries: Hogan (3), Poole, Morrison. Conversions: Burke (2).

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY: O Clayton (Eton and Homerton); S Sexton (Dublin HS and Hughes Hall), A Spencer (Priestley College and St John's), S Cottrell (Christ's Coll, NZ, and St Edmund's, captain), J Rutter (Chislehurst and Sidcup GS and Magdalene); R Ashforth (Bradford GS and Peterhouse), D Maslen (Randcombe's and St Edmund's); L Mooney (St Benetrace College and Hughes Hall), J Edwards (Coopers and Coborn and St Catharine's), N Holgate (Armthorpe CS and Robinson), M Hyde (St Ignatius Coll, Sydney, and St Edmund's), R Bramley (Queen Elizabeth's, Wakefield and St Edmund's), D Ruffell (Chosen Hill and Homerton), S Surridge (St Kentigern College, Auckland, and Wolfson), J Cocks (Newington Coll, Sydney, and St Edmund's). STEELE-BODGER'S XV: I C Glasgow (Heriot's FP); A Jones (Harlequins), M Denney (Bristol), N Beal (Northampton), R Davies (Harlequins); P Burke (Cork Constitution and Ireland), N Hogan (Terenure College and Ireland); G Halpin (London Irish and Ireland), J Hay (Hawick and Scotland), M Linnett (Worcester), C Gibson (Gloucester), M Haag (Bath), M Poole (Leicester), I Morrison (London Scottish and Scotland, captain), R Pool-Jones (Wasps). R Earnshaw (Yarm School, North Yorkshire and St John's) temporary replacement for Pool-Jones.

Referee: D Chapman (Yorkshire)

University matches frequently confound predictions, but the Bowring Bowl seems in secure hands. The Light Blues' greater power up front and quality in the back row ought to give Oxford considerable problems at Twickenham. Cambridge also seem to possess the greater poise and control in their play.

The students had much to live up to for a cluster of Old Blues had returned to see C. M. H. (Mike) Gibson unveil an honours board plaque in the pavilion. It was Gibson's first visit to Grange Road for 18 years and he saw the university concede an early 17-0 lead as Hogan, Poole and Morrison scored tries in the first 23 minutes.

The Light Blues, though, revived with speed and panache, the elusive Rutter getting their first try followed, on half-time, by Maslen's first of the afternoon.

Cambridge edged ahead with Ashforth's try three minutes after the interval, but Steele-Bodger's XV quickly replied with two tries by Hogan for a 29-20 advantage.

The inter-passing and support play of the invitation side was impressive, but Cambridge's greater pace finally clinched it. Sexton and Maslen adding further tries to put the university clear.

IN BRIEF

US look to Kite for Ryder Cup inspiration

TOM KITE was confirmed yesterday as captain of the United States Ryder Cup golf team for the 1997 match in Valderrama, Spain.

"This is the start of what will be a dream come true for the next couple of years, being captain of the Ryder Cup team," Kite said. "The No 1 responsibility, going beyond the sportsmanship and the tradition, is to get that Cup back over here where it belongs, in the United States."

The United States lost the Cup to Europe 14½-13½ in September at Oak Hill Country Club in Rochester, New York.

India's series

Cricket: India beat New Zealand by six wickets in their sixth and final one-day international in Bombay yesterday, avenging a crushing defeat in the previous match and wrapping up the series 3-2. New Zealand were bowled out for 126 in 35 overs, a total that India overhauled with 18 overs to spare.

Price on course

Bowls: John Price, holder of the CIS Masters title, comfortably beat Richard Corsie, the Commonwealth champion, 7-1, 7-2, in the semi-finals at Coatbridge yesterday. Andy Thomson was made to fight all the way before defeating Paul Conlan 7-3, 1-7, 7-1.

Gregory wins

Squash: Paul Gregory, the former British national champion who now plays for Greece, breezed into the quarter-finals of the Qatar international championship in Doha yesterday by defeating Mir Zaman Gul, of Pakistan, 15-6, 15-8, 15-10.

Dane goes down

Badminton: Poul-Erik Hoyer-Larsen, 30, from Denmark, the All-England champion, lost to Ong Ewe Hock, of Malaysia, 15-8, 15-8 in the first round of the world grand prix final in Singapore yesterday.

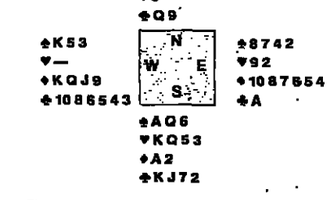

No more tickets

Cricket: The Texaco Trophy one-day international between England and India at the Oval next summer is already sold out. Tickets for the match, on May 23, were snapped up within just four weeks.

SHEEHAN on BRIDGE

BY ROBERT SHEEHAN BRIDGE CORRESPONDENT

Dealer South Love-all Match-pointed pairs

Contract: Six Hearts by South Lead: King of Diamonds

This is a hand from one of the annual auction pairs held at the St John's Wood Bridge Club. Last year, there was £7,000 in prize-money. The event is to be held this year on December 14 (telephone details: 0171-286 7465).

At tables where South opened the bidding with One Heart, South became the declarer in Six Hearts and West led the king of diamonds. Those who went off drew trumps ending in hand and played a small club towards the queen, hoping to bring down the ten and eight of clubs in three rounds and thus avoid the spade finesse.

The flaw in that line is that, if East has the ace of clubs, he will win and return a spade and South will not have a chance to test the clubs first. Not that it mattered — after this start, the contract was bound to go off anyway.

If you had had no other chances, the best play in the club suit to make three tricks is to finesse the nine on the first round. That is not right here though, with the spade finesse in reserve.

When Roman Smolski, one of the previous winners, played the hand, he noticed two club discards from West on the first two trumps. Drawing the inference that East was short in clubs, he crossed to dummy with a third trump and led the nine of clubs. When East had to win with the ace of clubs, declarer was then able to discard dummy's two losing spades on the king and jack of clubs. If West had had the ace, Smolski would still have had time to test the clubs before taking a spade finesse.

Wade wins

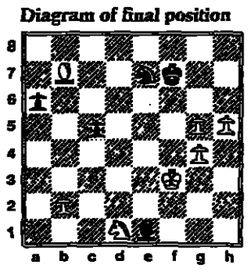

Great Britain's representative at the fifth world senior championship in Bad Liebenzell, Germany, was Bob Wade, from London, the former British champion and international master. Wade acquitted himself honourably. For much of the time, he was within striking distance of the leaders, and he eventually finished with the substantial plus score of 7½ out of 11. In the following game, Wade competently outplays his opponent to score a comprehensive victory.

SPORTS LETTERS

Business needs to follow sport's example

From Mr Dwight Lawrence

Sir, Youth crime today costs Britain £7 billion a year. I had the privilege to attend the launch of the Youth Charter for Sport (YCS) in Manchester (report, November 24) and, as a black professional specialising in business and equality issues, I experienced a sense of excitement and fear.

It was exciting to see how Geoff Thompson, five times world karate champion, has been a driving force, binding business, Government and other agencies together to raise £1 million for a variety of community projects. This is a type of working model that has yet to fulfil its potential in making a full impact on society and I know that the projects will produce young men and women who will become winners and inspirations for their communities.

My fear for the disadvantaged youth and particularly the future black youth (who in some areas of the United Kingdom will soon comprise up to 25 per cent of the key labour market) is that the key focus in developing "winners" from this area of society is still on the sporting, arts and entertainment fields.

Businesses, Government and our communities are missing a trick. We need to activate the phrase "Business in the Community" because the local communities and individuals have much to offer business and therefore the economy. We all recognise that we need to develop the kind of leadership among the youth that will serve our communities for generations. However, business and Government need to demonstrate the kind of leadership that will serve our youth and manage the diversity in our culture.

I applaud the YCS: they have forged a path for developing winners. However, there are many other organisations that have also developed models of success to assist the local young community in becoming the societal and business leaders of the future. Let's learn now and earn the benefits now.

My fear is that if we do not and we ignore the full benefits of linking business, Government and community that the children of today's youth will lack tomorrow's champions.

Sincerely,
DWIGHT LAWRENCE,
41 Merchants Quay,
Salford,
Manchester.

Angler's Charter

From the Shadow Minister for Sport

Sir, Brian Clarke (November 28) made clear that the leadership of the angling bodies seemed to be at odds with their membership.

However, one highly relevant point should be added, namely that the aims and aspirations of the angling fraternity have already been met by the Labour Party in its Angler's Charter.

The charter not only set out Labour's support for the sport, but also clarified in detail issues such as environmental protection, funding, the close season, codes of conduct and many other important angling concerns.

It is, therefore, all the more surprising that those who lead the anglers should be taking their present course of action and formalising links with hunting organisations. It is to be hoped that in future they will take more notice of their members' views.

Yours sincerely,
TOM PENDRY,
House of Commons.

Look abroad

From Mr Clive P. Ashford

Sir, The Lawn Tennis Association's efforts in getting back to the grass roots (report, November 22) are to be applauded.

However, throwing money at the problem, although a help, is not the answer. Coaches from abroad should be employed, eg, from Sweden, Germany or Spain, who have worked with world-class top-ten players, up to a maximum of five years ago (any more and they will not be in touch with the game being played now), instead of the poor quality coaches who are at present involved in the United Kingdom.

In addition, these coaches should not have to gain qualifications from the LTA. This is not only insulting to them, but also calls into question whether this is a contravention of European law on the free movement of labour within the European Union. As I understand it, this gives any tennis professional from within the European Union the right to be employed in Britain.

With these coaches lies the only way for us to produce a Wimbledon champion. United Kingdom coaches seem just to want to go through the motions of being a tennis coach and get themselves a coaching position. They feel that taking a player up to county level is a major achievement, but British county level, when compared with the rest of the world, is nowhere.

In five years, a beginner can be taken up to world-class, top-ten level, but so far I have met only one coach in the United Kingdom who has the right attitude and the commitment to realise this.

The talent is out there at grass-roots level, but it requires world-class coaches to nurture it and take it all the way.

Yours truly,
CLIVE P. ASHFORD,
(Kent county tennis coaches committee),
115 Calvert Road,
Greenwich, SE10.

Sports Letters may be sent by fax to 0171-782 5211. They must include a daytime telephone number.

Expand use of videos

From Mr Roy Ritchie

Sir, The Scottish Football Association recently announced its willingness to consider video evidence in respect of foul play not seen or reported by match officials. This appears a sensible move in attempting to eradicate foul play. However, the use of video film should be expanded to include other areas.

Miniature cameras should be installed in goalpost uprights and crossbar to confirm whether or not the ball crossed the goalline. If the referee and linesman are unsighted, the game can be stopped while the fourth official reviews video film from these cameras. If the ball did not cross the line, a goal kick is awarded to the defending team.

Match officals do make mistakes and, in two recent matches (Manchester United v Coventry City and Real Madrid v Ajax), film evidence clearly showed that the ball had crossed the line, but a goal was not awarded.

If players' conduct is to be assessed by cameras, then it is only fair that match officials' performances should be similarly scrutinised.

Yours etc.,
R. RITCHIE,
10 Lochgreen Avenue,
Troon, Ayrshire.

A tough world

From Mr Michael Dalton

Sir, Rob Hughes (November 24) says that many footballers will ask what all the fuss is about after the Le Saux-Batty incident. Anyone in the world of business will explain that partners and fellow directors often "have a go" at each other in their private meetings. It is a tough old world, and we have to sort the men (the winners) from the boys (the losers) somehow.

Yours faithfully,
MICHAEL DALTON,
1a Mengham Road,
Hayling Island, Hampshire.

Dunwoody firmly committed to Ireland

By Our Irish Racing Correspondent

The staff at Stansted and Birmingham airports have been seeing a lot of Richard Dunwoody in the last six months. Mind you, they have to be up early to do so. Departures, starting at 5am, have become commonplace for the champion jockey. His feverish trawl for winners, with its consequent pressures and sacrifices, is being scaled down. The workload, however, is not.

This season, Dunwoody has been crossing the Irish Sea with the frequency of the Holyhead ferry. Today, it is Thurles racecourse in Co Tipperary. Tomorrow, he goes to Sandown and, after riding at the same track again on Saturday, he flies back to Ireland for Fairyhouse's Sunday meeting.

Dunwoody has loosened his grip on trying to retain his title and, despite all the travelling and the constant threat of injury, he is now enjoying his racing more than ever.

He said: "It's still a six-day-week job and I am riding as much as ever, but it is easier now. The pressure of the championship and constantly chasing winners has gone."

He had had enough of that intensity last May. With the advent of summer jumping, and wanting the freedom to ride in the United States or Ireland during the summer, it was inevitable that Dunwoody would split from Martin Pipe. "I wanted to ease back a bit. During the summer, Dermot Weld and Edward O'Grady started giving me rides and one thing led to another. There is no retainer with either of them, just an agreement, and I am delighted with the way things have gone," he said.

Dunwoody has ridden 29 winners in Ireland this season, putting him in third place in the table behind the runaway leader, Charlie Swan. Those winners have included high-class horses like Sound Man and Merry Gale, who have helped to make the travelling worthwhile.

Typically, Dunwoody plays down the travel factor. "Going to Ireland is probably less stressful than riding in the north of England. I went to Catterick recently and found again that you can't depend on the motorways. There were three separate accidents on the way home and a three-hour journey was turned into four," he reported.

Nevertheless, Dunwoody is cementing his Irish connection and hopes to purchase an apartment in Naas, 20 miles south of Dublin, early next month. Up to now, overnight stays have been spent with friends such as Mick O'Toole, the Curragh trainer.

Dunwoody may find Irish racing enjoyable, but he is under no illusions about the seriousness with which the local riders view their jobs.

"It's very competitive. If anything, I think the racing is tighter in Ireland. There are less meetings so the top jockeys are almost always against each other and when push comes to shove you have to be able to hold your position. I've always enjoyed riding in Ireland. Racecourse atmospheres are similar wherever you go but I feel the Irish crowds tend to be more knowledgeable about the game. They really are very keen about racing, both in Ireland and England," Dunwoody said.

Edward O'Grady is an Irish trainer who strongly believes that the affection is reciprocated. "I think that no public in the world appreciates a great horse or jockey more than the Irish and I believe they realise they are privileged to see Richard in action, not only at our premier tracks but at some of our lesser ones too," he said.

O'Grady sends Sound Man to Sandown on Saturday for the Mitsubishi Shogun Chase and he believes Dunwoody's presence on the horse is a plus factor. "His knowledge of both his own horse and the opposition is unbelievable. Throw in his dedication, his ability to work and phenomenal natural talent and I suppose you have genius," O'Grady added.

Dunwoody's contentment with his new regime has also been helped by not having to fight the scales constantly. "My weight has settled down at 10st 4lb and I can ride at that comfortably. I find it makes all the difference," he said.

At 31 and with nothing to prove, Dunwoody's priority is to enjoy his racing and his Irish connections are an important part of that aim.

For the foreseeable future, early travellers at Stansted and Birmingham will continue to see Dunwoody stride purposefully for the next plane to Ireland.

Layers and ROA at odds over betting tax figures

By Julian Muscat

BOOKMAKERS yesterday railed against the view, expressed in racing circles, that there was scope for both an increase in levy and a decrease in punters' deductions in the wake of the 1 per cent cut in betting duty announced in the Budget on Tuesday.

Figures produced by the Racehorse Owners' Association (ROA) maintained that bookmakers collected in excess of their duty and levy liabilities from the 10 per cent deduction charged to punters as "betting tax". But Tom Kelly, director-general of the Betting Office Licensees' Association (Bola), insisted the data was inaccurate.

"It fails to recognise the real burden of betting duty," Kelly said. "Until yesterday, duty was charged at 7.75 per cent but the actual figure is more like 8.5 per cent. There is no surplus. In fact, the liability for betting shops with high levels of turnover works out at a fraction more than 10 per cent."

A number of important factors serve to dilute Bola's argument. The reduction in betting duty means that high-turnover shops will make a small profit on punters' deductions even if the rate is lowered from 10 to 9 per cent. Bola's equation is based on shops with high turnover. But because levy is paid on a sliding scale, the liability for smaller shops is significantly less. And Bola's argument operates on the basis that all punters pay tax on their stake. That is not the case.

Other factors suggest there is surplus fat from which bookmakers can draw. Bola's equation applies only to wagers struck on horse racing — which account for around 75 per cent of betting turnover. In the ever-burgeoning sports betting market, the maximum duty paid by high-turnover shops is around 8.5 per cent. Yet punters remain "taxed" at 10 per cent.

There is also the not inconsiderable sum retained by bookmakers in unclaimed winnings. And bookmakers defend their right to pass on, through deductions from punters, their non-recoverable VAT burden. However, an influential Home Affairs Committee report on the levy, published four years ago, was scathing of the practice, describing it as "entirely indefensible."

The committee was equally insistent on bookmakers' description of the 10 per cent deduction as a betting tax. "To call bookmakers' deductions 'tax' is at the least disingenuous, at worst less than honest," the report said.

Neither the bookmakers nor the British Horseracing Board was yesterday in any hurry to open negotiations on how the £65 million is to be carved up.

Fewer tears falling as standards rise again

BY JOHN HOPKINS, GOLF CORRESPONDENT

SOME relieved men were flying from the Costa del Sol to their homes yesterday — in particular 12 Englishmen, five Irishmen and five Swedes, three Spaniards, two Danes, two Scots, two Welshmen, two Americans and one each from Argentina, South Africa, Germany, France, Holland, Norway, Finland and Australia.

They were leaving Guadalmina and San Roque golf clubs with a sense of achievement that, of the 183 competitors who had attended the qualifying school, they were the 41 who had won places on the PGA European Tour in 1996.

A little of the drama has gone out of the qualifying school these days with the emergence of worthwhile lesser tours. Scenes such as those at La Manga in 1986, when grown men cried with pleasure and frustration, have almost all gone now.

This is in part because the players are more professional and in part because a place on the European Tour is not the only possibility for men who want to make a living playing golf at the highest level.

The Challenge tour was begun in 1989 and has proved itself a success, as has the Hippo Tour, a more recent competition. Named after a clothing manufacturer and run by Randy Fox, an energetic American turned travel agent in London, and Cathy Longhurst, a good name to have in golf, it is about to start its third year with 16 events, compared with five two years ago.

These tours have given a safety net to those players who otherwise would have been scrambling around seeking competition before beginning their annual attempts to reach the main tour through the qualifying schools.

If these tours have created extra employment for professionals, then they have also helped to create a dramatic improvement in standards. Now, there is an increasing supply of ever-improving young talent, not only from the traditional golfing countries, but also from Germany, Finland, Norway and Holland.

Memories may be playing tricks, but the recollections from the tour school at La Manga in 1986 were of a number of very good and not very good players and quite a few who were good but not quite good enough. On Guadalmina's winding fairways and the more exposed acres of San Roque, the overall standard was not dissimilar from a European tour event of 15 years ago.

No matter to what extent the standard has risen, the effect that the pressure created in the sixth round was remarkable. Players who performed quite steadily until the last day went to pieces, while others, showing a mental fortitude that should serve them well, fought tenaciously and ultimately successfully.

Richard Dinsdale, for example, was out in 39 and seven over par. The Welshman knew that the target was six over — and he courageously birdied two of his last four holes to qualify.

Nobody who was anywhere near David Howell as he sank a 12-yard chip from above the flag on his 16th hole on Tuesday — his 105th of the tournament — will have failed to realise the significance of what he had done. It took Howell, the former Walker Cup player, to five over par, some of the pressure was lifted and he birdied the last hole, too.

It was a pleasure to see Juan Carlos Piñero, the brother of Manuel, get his card at his eighth attempt as it was to observe the first, far-from-faltering, steps as a professional of Stephen Gallacher. He seemed as unflappable when he hit a rare bad shot as he was unimpressed on striking one that met his own exacting standards. His name is to be written down for the future to continue the link between European golf and Gallacher.

On the evidence of this qualifying school, the body of competitive professional golf in Europe is unquestionably in good condition. If only these young men would play more quickly; five hours for a round is far too long.

A second round of 72, that included three birdies, gave Tracey Craik the halfway lead in the American Express Tour qualifying school tournament at La Manga Club, Spain yesterday. The Oxfordshire-based Scot's total of 143, one under par, put her one stroke ahead of Anne-Marie Knight, of Australia, who had the day's best round with a 69. Tracey Loveys, from Dorset, lies a further stroke behind.

Rebels with a cause head for the border

As Colwyn Bay bid for FA Cup glory, Peter Ball discovers the club that has a long and bitter tradition of confounding the odds

In August, the two surviving members of the Welsh "Irate Eight", Newport and Colwyn Bay, met in a pre-season friendly. It was quickly dubbed a match for "The Rebels' Cup".

Colwyn Bay won. On Saturday, they have a rather more prestigious cup match, at Blackpool in the second round of the FA Cup, the furthest that the club has been in the competition and a reward for the fortitude shown in its battle with the Football Association of Wales (FAW) for the right to play in English non-league football.

"The last few years have been tough — tough to the point where you wonder: 'Is it worth it?'" Alan Banks, the club's honorary secretary, said. "But, when you get a bit of a run in the FA Cup, you say: 'Yes, it is.'"

When Banks first became associated with the club, in the 1960s, most football supporters did not even travel as far as Wrexham, let alone fill the coaches which, these days, depart from north Wales every Saturday heading for Old Trafford, Anfield or Goodison Park.

Back then, the traffic was all in the other direction; every Saturday, trains and buses, and the occasional car, brought footballers from Lancashire to play for Rhyl, Llandudno or Colwyn Bay.

"It was called the Gold Coast in those days because the money was here for the players," Banks said. "Hundreds used to come down to play in the Fifties and Sixties. With their jobs as well, they used to earn more than they would with Football League sides; but the money dried up."

It took Colwyn Bay 15 years to recover from the debts. "The debts were finally paid off in 1979, and we began to turn the corner," Banks, who became secretary in 1967, said.

The turning of the corner was swiftly followed by the appointment of Bryn Jones as player-manager. Jones, a butcher in his day job, has been there ever since, taking the side up six divisions from the now-defunct Welsh League North through the North West Counties to the Northern Premier in his 15 years.

Four years ago, they were making impressive progress up the English non-league pyramid, winning the first division of the Northern Premier League to move up into the premier division when the FAW decided to form the Konica League of Wales and ordered all of its clubs to join.

Colwyn was one of eight clubs that defied the order. Apart from Newport, the others surrendered, but Colwyn Bay went into exile, first at Northwich and then at Ellesmere Port, as they embarked upon a long and draining court case in which Colwyn and Newport took on not just the FAW but the might of Fifa, the world governing body.

That has been successful, at least temporarily, but the costs have been high. "As a club, we've been held back by having to play two years in exile," Jones said. "We were a progressive club three years ago; we were winning things, there was interest in the town, but we lost the momentum with having to play away.

"We had everything pulled away from us — money; playing away from Colwyn meant no support and no atmosphere; the players felt they were fighting an uphill battle against the FAW, not thinking they were going to get anywhere, not knowing whether they had any future.

"If we had been just a team brought in by a benefactor — which you sometimes get at this level — rather than a club, we wouldn't have survived, but there are no mercenaries here. The lads could all do better elsewhere, but they didn't want to play in the Welsh League, they wanted to play in a better standard of football."

The team, six of whom, including Dave Brett, the player/assistant manager, and Peter Donnelly, the captain, have been at the club for six or seven years, stayed loyal, and are now reaping the reward with the trip to Blackpool. In Jones's words, it is: "The biggest game of their lives".

It will be productive for the club, too. "This FA Cup run has given the club the lift it needed, given us a little bit of a kick-start," Jones said. Although the average gate is now around 400, about 300 down on the figure before they went to Northwich, they expect to take 800 supporters with them to Blackpool.

"The phone's been hot," Banks said. "As well as the supporters' club, pubs and other local organisations are running trips. The FA Cup brings them all out, doesn't it?"

Charlton leaves play-off place for Keane

BY OUR SPORTS STAFF

JACK CHARLTON, the manager of Ireland, yesterday left a place open for Roy Keane in his squad to play Holland in the European football championship qualifying play-off match at Anfield on December 13.

Keane, the Manchester United midfield player, underwent a hernia operation three weeks ago and missed Ireland's 3-0 defeat in Portugal. He played in only three of Ireland's ten matches in group six, in which they finished runners-up. Charlton, though, is determined to give him every chance of recovering, and has named a 21-strong squad. Niall Quinn, the Manchester City striker, is suspended, Tommy Coyne, of Motherwell, injured, and Eddie McGoldrick, of Arsenal, dropped.

"If it can be proved that Keane has recovered from his injury, I would still like to have him in the squad, and I will leave it as long as possible to see what can be done," Charlton said.

Charlton's decision again to invoke the five-day international rule has caused consternation among FA Carling Premiership clubs, which face a full programme on the weekend before.

Arsenal, Manchester United, Sheffield Wednesday, Liverpool, Aston Villa, Chelsea, Blackburn Rovers, Manchester City and Middlesbrough are affected, but the Premier League is sticking firmly to its rule book, and yesterday insisted that matches stay on the original date of December 9.

IRELAND SQUAD: A Kelly (Sheffield United), P Bonner (Celtic), D Irwin (Manchester United), G Kelly (Leeds United), J Kenna, (Blackburn Rovers), P McGrath (Aston Villa), P Babb (Liverpool), T Phelan (Chelsea), S Staunton (Aston Villa), J Sheridan (Sheffield Wednesday), R Houghton (Crystal Palace), J McAteer (Liverpool), M Milligan (Norwich City), A Townsend (Aston Villa), A McLoughlin (Portsmouth), D Kelly (Sunderland), J Aldridge (Tranmere Rovers), A Cascarino (Marseilles), M Kennedy (Liverpool), C Morris (Middlesbrough), A Kernaghan (Manchester City).

Graham Pearce and Graham Moseley

A report (November 24) about an on-pitch fight involving Blackburn Rovers footballers stated that Graham Pearce and Graham Moseley, two Brighton players, had been booked for fighting in 1981. This information was provided by a reputable sports news agency and we had no reason to doubt its accuracy. In fact, neither Graham Pearce nor Graham Moseley was involved in any such incident. We apologise for any embarrassment caused by this mistake.

China's wall of silence offers Le no protection

FROM CRAIG LORD IN RIO DE JANEIRO

WIN or lose over the next four days in the world short-course championships here, China will remain a pariah in swimming after a year in which 15 positive drugs tests took the country's tally to 19 and confirmed the suspicions and fears of rival nations.

If the Chinese women fall short of their phenomenal form of the past two years, they will be ridiculed and their humbling held up as confirmation of sins past.

If, however, they repeat the success of the inaugural short-course championships, two years ago, and that of the long-course equivalent last year, they will be peppered with questions about drugs and lambasted for remaining silent on the subject. The noise will come from the World Swimming Coaches Association, which wants China suspended from competition until it can prove that it has its drugs crisis under control.

Pickering: medal hopes

With so few results from competition in China reported for inclusion on the world-rankings list, predictions of form are difficult to make. This morning will reveal whether the world can expect a repeat of Palma de Majorca two years ago, when Chinese women won nine out of 16 titles and set 11 world records. Le Jingyi and Liu Limin will take to their blocks in defence of the titles that they will find hardest to hold on to, the 100 metres freestyle and 200 metres butterfly respectively. Le, 20, faces Franziska van Almsick, the last product of East Germany, who has become the wealthiest swimmer in the world during a four-year career in a united Germany in which she has won only one world title.

Van Almsick, 17, has a cold and cancelled a press conference yesterday. Le, too, has been little seen and never heard, the Chinese preferring to protect her from the gaze of those hoping to see whether the astonishing musculature that helped her power to five world long-course titles and four world records last year has diminished. Her times this year are two seconds adrift of her world-record pace over 100 metres.

Liu, on the other hand, has swum consistently close to her best and enters as favourite, despite the presence of Susan O'Neill, of Australia, who set the third fastest 200 metres butterfly long-course time in history in August. Both adapt well to short course, in which the pool, 25 metres as opposed to 50, dictates more turns.

Beyond Le and Liu are several new names whose potential cannot be understated. The one to watch is Na Chao, 15, who rose from 65th to third in the world at 50 metres freestyle last summer but is entered in the 100, 200 and 400 metres freestyle here with world-class times that are not registered on the world-ranking list. Na's entry time in the 200 metres ranks above that of Karen Pickering, of Ipswich, who won the title in Palma in a time that remains the second fastest in history. Pickering, 23, was happy not to be favourite for the title this time. Van Almsick, the world record-holder, holds that honour.

In the long-distance freestyle events, Sarah Hardcastle, 26, will carry Great Britain's best medal hopes. A better short-course swimmer than long, Hardcastle has undergone six weeks of hypnotherapy to help her achieve success in the 400 and 800 metres freestyle.

While some races reflect world standards, the decision of the United States and Russia not to send their strongest teams, and with Hungary and Finland declining invitations, weakness abounds. Of the 32 titles, only half will be defended.

In the absence of Aleksandr Popov, the world record-holder, Brazil hopes to turn the Copacabana pool into an aquatic carnival. Gustavo Borges, fastest in the world over 100 metres freestyle this year, is favourite for the title.

Neil Willey, of the Barnet Copthall club in London, hopes for a medal-winning and British record-breaking performance in the 100 metres backstroke, but Nick Gillingham and Mark Foster will not defend their titles.

Stuart Jones meets one of four women who are breaking down a long-standing sporting barrier

SIMON WALKER

Solomons, who has thrown a perfect 501 in competition, practises for her world championship debut today

Another male bastion is about to fall. On the oche this afternoon will stand the first women to compete in the world professional darts championship, albeit in the qualifying stages at the Earls Court international hotel.

Of the four pioneers, all of them English, the most prominent is the youngest, Mandy Solomons. She is ranked No 3 in the country and this season became the first domestic representative to embrace perfection by scoring 501 in nine darts.

The feat, achieved in the less than glamorous context of a Greater London super league match between Hackney and West Ham, sets her apart. Yet Solomons, 32, stressed that her unprecedented intrusion into the elite should be regarded merely as natural evolution. "It's no big deal," she said.

She accepts that outsiders might put a different interpretation on the quartet's appearance and does not expect a warm welcome from the male contenders this afternoon. "They're not happy because they're losing places in the qualifying competition," Solomons said. "They would rather we had our own championship."

For five years, the women have been making the same plea, but sponsors have been reluctant to grant the wish. Indeed, apart from matches in the Islington mixed league, Solomons has played against only one man — Cliff Lazarenko in an exhibition in Winchester.

She won, but is not optimistic that she will progress this week. "A win would be a bonus," she said. "You never know whether you are going to play well or not." Ominously, though, the same lack of conviction was evident during her historic 501.

Only after seven successive treble 20s did she foresee the realisation of "a dream since I started playing". Although there was a darts board hung up at home, her parents allowed her to take part only as a marker. Her career began "upstairs at the supermarket where I worked" when she was 21.

Seven years ago, she won the world masters, also at Earls Court, and chose to resign from her job as a machinist sewing leather "to make men's shoes". She signed a one-year contract with her sponsors and is now the only female professional in England.

Nevertheless, she does not earn enough to travel to all of the tournaments and Deta Hedman, her doubles partner, has gained sufficient points to be ranked No 1. Together, they have won the Dutch, Swiss and Norwegian titles as well as the World Cup this year.

Sandra Greatbach, a vegetable grader who will be 50 in February, and Sharon Colclough, a shop assistant from Hayes, are the other members of the quartet. None of them is expected to be among the last 32, who will contest the world title at Frimley Green in the first week of the new year. Nor, according to Solomons, are the four about to revolutionise the enduring image of the sport.

She does not indulge in physical training and readily admits that she has "put on about two stone" since 1988. If she was not throwing darts for a living, she would like to have her own pub.

So reticent that she confesses to being shy, she has no misgivings about being watched by a crowd far larger than is her usual experience. "I'll just cut them out, block them off," she said. At her three matches during any week, she performs in front of "maybe a dozen people".

As she warms up this morning, she says that she will not give a thought to repeating the perfect game later in the day. However, should she qualify for Frimley Green and reach 501 in nine darts again, it would earn her £52,000.

Headley follows family tradition

FROM PAT GIBSON IN RAWALPINDI

DEAN HEADLEY has his answer ready when he is asked if he thinks that he will ever be as good as George, his grandfather, the first of the great West Indian cricketers, or even Ron, his father, the former Worcestershire opener who would almost certainly have won more than two Test caps if he had not decided to settle in England.

"I am a far better bowler than they were already," Headley says in an accent that is unmistakably West Midlands, where he grew up with all the great expectations that are heaped on such famous names as his.

There was never much chance that he would be as good a batsman as his grandfather, but he is right about the bowling. It appears that he could make history himself by becoming the third Headley to play Test cricket, albeit for a different country.

Headley was added to the England A squad on tour in Pakistan only as an afterthought, the selectors calling him in to replace Peter Martin when he was promoted to the senior tour of South Africa, but he has bowled so well that his name will be one of the first on the team-sheet for the second international match against Pakistan A, which is due to start here today. The team has not been finalised because the first of Pakistan's winter rains arrived in such quantities on Tuesday that the water poured under the tarpaulin covers and flooded the pitch at the KRL (Khan Research Laboratories) Stadium, which is a neat enough little ground but hardly the setting for an international match.

Nobody knows how the pitch will play when the match eventually gets under way, which may not be on the first day, so England A are keeping all their seam bowling options open. They may even find a place for Tim Munton, who was expected to have to wait his turn after arriving as a replacement for the injured Mike Smith. Munton will be ideally suited by a seaming pitch, but it is certain that Headley will be given the chance to add to the 14 wickets that he has taken, at a cost of 164 runs, in 87 impressive overs in his two first-class matches of the tour.

It is a performance that has surprised even John Emburey, the team manager, who played with Headley for Middlesex before Headley joined Kent two years ago. Emburey is considering putting him forward as a candidate for the England World Cup squad on the sub-continent early next year.

Headley has certainly shown that he can bowl on the pitches here, his tight line, ability to swing the new ball away and increasing expertise at reverse swing with the old one frustrating batsmen into error. He probably has little chance of making it to the World Cup at this late stage, but he could serve England well on future trips to these parts.

In that case, he might just be wrong when he says: "If I have a son, people will say, 'Oh yes, George Headley was your great-grandad and Ron Headley was your grandad . . . now who's your father again?'"

Shane Warne, the Australia leg spinner, was passed fit yesterday to play in the final Test of the three-match series against Pakistan that starts in Sydney today. He will wear a protective cap in his boot when batting to shield the toe that he cracked in the second Test, in Hobart, last week.

Crackdown after Murray inquiry

BY JOHN GOODBODY AND SRIKUMAR SEN

GREAT Britain's boxing officials yesterday banned mixed promotions, in which non-dinner guests are allowed into dinner shows, after the riot in a Glasgow hotel at the end of the title bout in which James Murray died last month.

The British Boxing Board of Control also ordered closer liaison by promoters with security firms and police.

The board, which set up a tribunal to investigate the violence, said that one of the problems at the Hospitality Inn in Glasgow was that, because the promotion was primarily a dinner show, security was inadequate to cope with the large number of spectators. Some began throwing bottles and chairs as the British bantamweight title bout ended with Murray fatally injured.

The board's stewards concluded that a section of the crowd, who had purchased tickets for the boxing only, had caused the disturbances, adding that the problem appeared to have been exacerbated by alcohol. The tribunal, chaired by Sir David Hopkin, said, after its four-hour hearing, that no fault lay with hotel or the promoters, Frank Warren and Katherine Morrison.

Murray, who collapsed in the ring, later died in hospital after losing the contest to Drew Docherty.

Riddick Bowe, the World Boxing Organisation heavyweight champion, has been offered $9 million (nearly £6 million) to meet Lennox Lewis, of Britain. If Bowe accepts, the bout will take place in March or April in Kenya, South Africa or Las Vegas.

Panos Eliades, Lewis's backer, who made the offer, said that he has spoken to Rock Newman, Bowe's manager. "The fight will be good for the sport and we are geared up for it," he said. "Kenya, South Africa and even Las Vegas all want the fight. It is the biggest fight out there."

Eliades added, however, that, after Lewis's display of power in stopping Tommy Morrison, Newman might hold out for more money, or turn down the contest.

Eliades is also trying to stop Frank Bruno meeting Mike Tyson before Lewis, and is contesting in a federal court in New Jersey the World Boxing Council's decision to give Tyson preference over Lewis.

Wanderers pitch prompts England to consider picking four fast bowlers

Illingworth hints at full seam ahead

FROM ALAN LEE, CRICKET CORRESPONDENT IN JOHANNESBURG

RAYMOND Illingworth has been playing a lot of bridge on this tour and his card-player's cunning was given full rein yesterday. As officials of both sides stared with suspicion at the pitch for the second Test match with South Africa, that starts here this morning, the England manager was inscrutable about his intended strategy. He might do one thing, he might do another, and, if he had privately made up his mind, he was not letting on.

Officially, England will choose from the same 13 named before the rain-ruined first Test a fortnight ago, but, whereas manager and captain were in no doubt about the necessary balance for that match, there were hints of ambivalence yesterday and the suggestion of an all-seam attack was not thrown in entirely to confuse an opposition simultaneously retreating from just such a policy.

Warne fit 45

Illingworth likes nothing better than the pre-match mental jousting, the analysis of a pitch and the manoeuvring for psychological advantage. He is unarguably one-up after Centurion Park, where he interpreted the conditions and chose the required attack far better than the home side, but the abortive nature of that match means that the series effectively begins again today.

Of all the Test grounds in South Africa, the impressive Wanderers stadium, in the leafy Johannesburg suburb of Illovo, is alone in encouraging the thought that England might fare best without spin. This was plainly preying on Illingworth's mind yesterday, and although both he and Michael Atherton, the captain, stressed that they would be reluctant to take such a course, the odds against it have shrunk since the week began.

This is largely because of the appearance of the pitch. Chris Scott, the groundsman at the Wanderers for the past 26 years, has had to relocate from his intended strip, because of match schedules and the recent rains, and the surface yesterday remained well grassed and soft enough for studs to sink readily. Hansie Cronje and Bob Woolmer, the South Africa captain and coach, studied it at length, wearing pensive frowns not unconnected, one would guess, with their self-confessed misreading of the Centurion Park pitch.

South Africa, having played five seam bowlers there, are now likely to include Clive Eksteen, their slow left-armer, instead of the injured Brett Schultz and may replace Craig Matthews with Meyrick Pringle, who bowls out-swingers. England could be unchanged: alternatively, Richard Illingworth's spin could give way to Mark Ilott's swing or even, more speculatively, Devon Malcolm's speed.

Malcolm had been discounted after his latest uninspiring efforts at Bloemfontein and it seemed that the speculation over his role in the series was about to end — he did not have one.

A reprieve may come through the possibility of this pitch quickening in pace and deteriorating in bounce, though, even in such propitious conditions, selecting Malcolm involves gambling upon him locating the cut part of the square more often than of late.

Illingworth warned that the pitch would need to have dried out considerably by this morning for the Malcolm option to be further explored, and the violent thunderstorms that returned to Johannesburg late yesterday, bringing darkness soon after the cricketing tea-time, make that unlikely. Ilott, who would swing the ball in the breathy, confined atmosphere of the ground known as "The Bullring", is a more reliable choice.

England's intended net practice at Centurion Park was abandoned because of another storm yesterday morning and the interference of the weather here is a serious threat to a tour that badly needs a change of gear. "You keep building them up, then have to mess around doing nothing," Illingworth said. Atherton agreed, adding: "We just want to get on with the proper stuff. Our bowlers are fresh, which is something, and, psychologically, we at least know our batsmen can get runs against their attack."

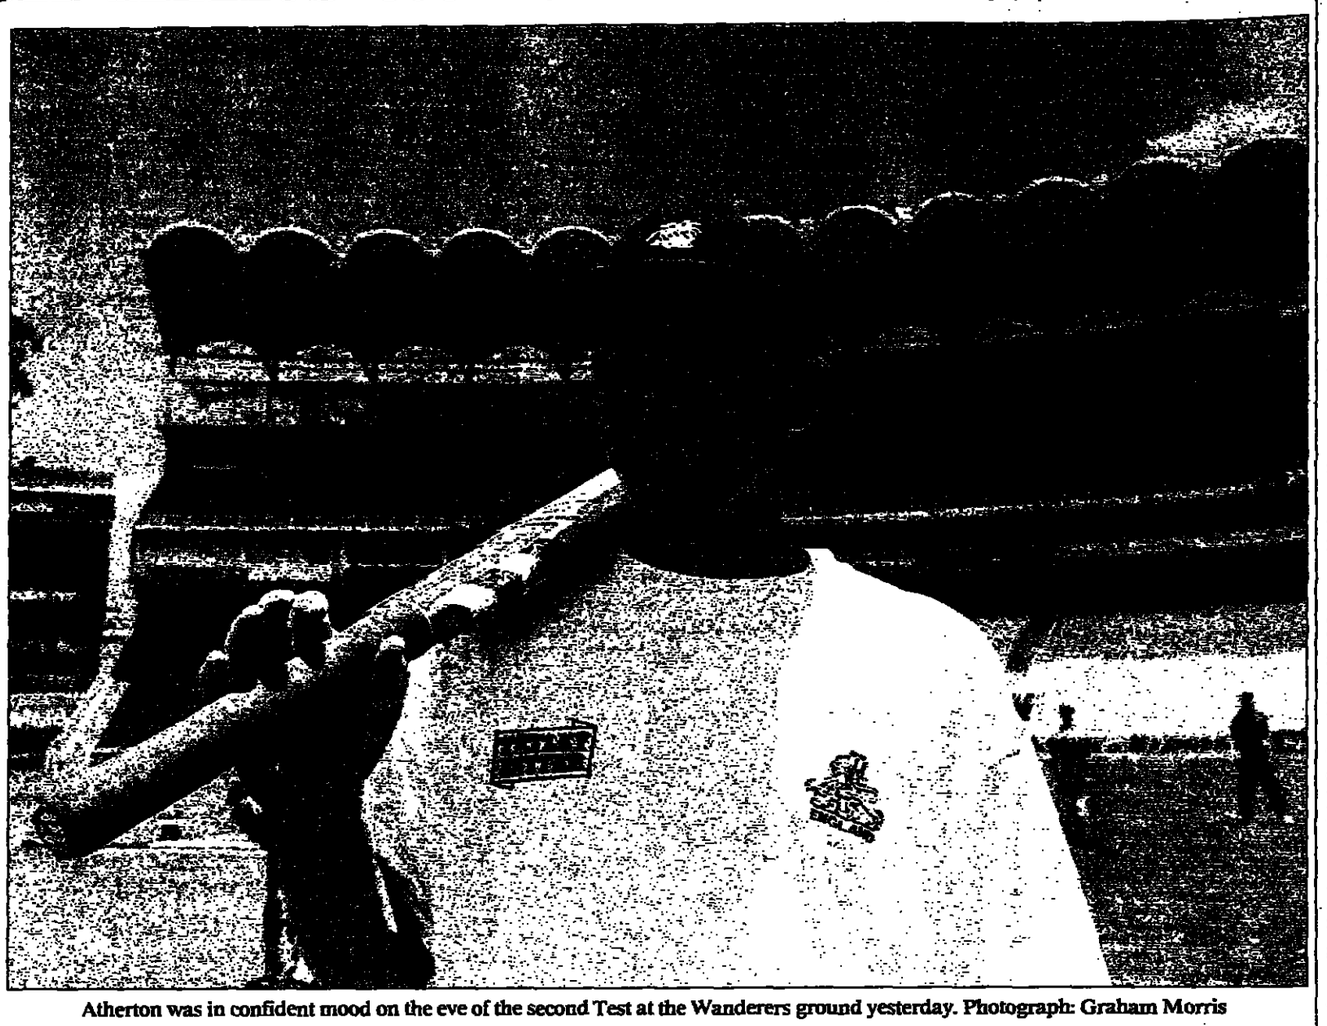

The batting, or rather two elements of it, however, continues to concern Illingworth. He is fretting about Mark Ramprakash, who has the worst Test record of any batsman on either side, and about Robin Smith, who has the best. Oddly, the greater anxiety seems to involve Smith, whose painful, runless 40 minutes in Bloemfontein at the weekend did nothing to dispel his manager's doubts. "It wasn't the most exciting nought, was it?" Illingworth said, chuckling in spite of himself.

"I am very worried, to be honest, not only by his lack of a big score but by the way he is playing; but we are backing the fact that he has done it all before, backing his temperament."

In the case of Ramprakash, England are trying to ignore his temperament, which is demonstrably flawed, in the hope that his rich talent will eventually overcome it. "He gets a little bit uptight," Illingworth said, "but we can't do any more for him. He has the chance and he must make it work himself."

Thirty-one winters ago, when England last toured this country, they had no such problems at No 3. Ted Dexter breezed in, a cricketer once more after a brief and unsuccessful diversion into politics, and made 172 at the Wanderers, his last Test century. England would give much for Ramprakash's first today.

Both Tests on the ground last winter were convincingly won by the side batting first, with the pitch deteriorating over the last two days. Atherton confirmed that he would seek to bat first, but the local bookmakers are sceptical. They make England 3-1 outsiders and rate the draw as favourite. They must have seen the weather forecast.

Blackburn brawlers banned as Uefa sees new report

BY PETER BALL

BLACKBURN Rovers' hopes that they could put the unhappy events of last Wednesday behind them were dashed yesterday.

In a surprising volte-face, Uefa, the governing body of football in Europe, condemned the "grossly unsporting conduct" of Graeme Le Saux and David Batty during their mid-match brawl in Moscow and suspended the pair for two European games. Forty-eight hours earlier, it had said it was taking no action.

The Uefa statement said that the case had been "opened [sic] on the basis of new facts". Uefa had originally followed the referee's report, which had not deemed the incident worthy of action.

The change followed a submission contained in the Uefa observer's fair play report. The change of heart will come as some relief to the Football Association, which had initially asked Uefa to deal with the matter, and had been embarrassed by its initial refusal. The FA had then set its own disciplinary processes in motion, but these have now been halted.

The practical impact of the Uefa ban is small for Blackburn, at least in the immediate future. It means that the players will miss the last and, for Blackburn, meaningless game in the Champions' League next Wednesday, against Rosenborg, of Norway, and the club's next game in a European competition, whenever that might be.

It is, however, a moral blow, as the statement by Rob Coar, the club chairman, made clear. "The news comes as a bit of a shock to the club," Coar said.

"All the statements we had seen attributed to Uefa in the media said they were not going to take any further action, and that the club's internal action would stand.

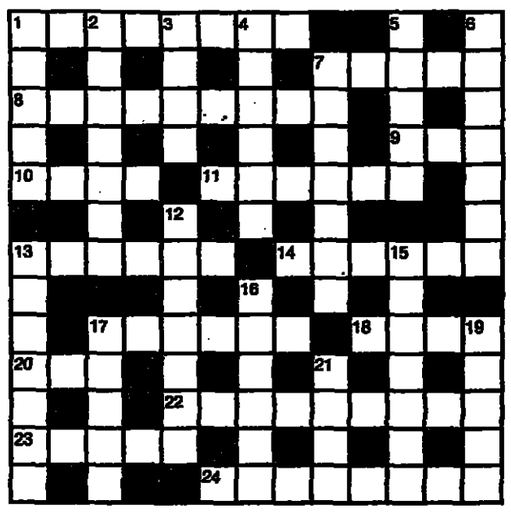

"Obviously, we are disappointed to find that these bans have been imposed, but it is something we shall have to accept."

The club had fined both players for the brawl, that erupted when they collided four minutes into the team's match with Spartak.

Newlove eager to justify world record transfer fee

BY CHRISTOPHER IRVINE

UNLIKE football, it has taken nearly four years for the inflationary spiral to catch up with a generally dormant transfer market in rugby league, which is why a world record £500,000 deal taking Paul Newlove from Bradford Bulls to St Helens yesterday is not being seen as the trigger for a mass sale of players.

The previous record was a straightforward cash deposit of £440,000 paid to Widnes by Wigan for Martin Offiah in January 1992. Beating it involved a cobbled four-man deal, with Newlove passing Sonny Nickle, Paul Loughlin and Bernard Dwyer in the opposite direction. The experienced trio formed the other half of a £250,000 down-payment to Bradford by St Helens for the Great Britain centre.

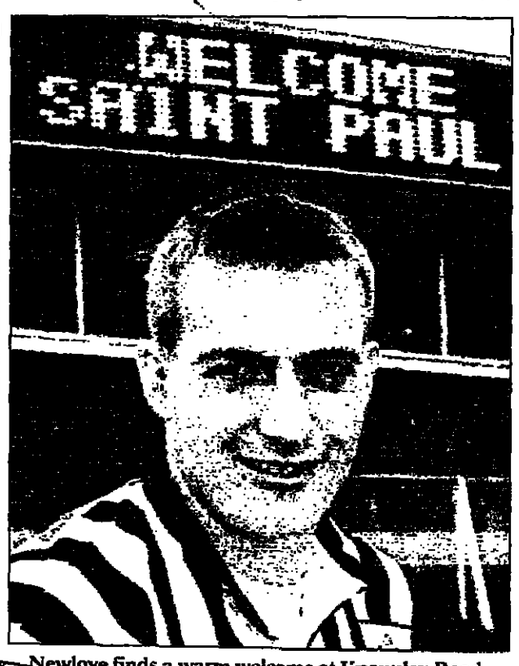

On signing a four-year contract at Knowsley Road, after an unsettling and, at times, bitter few weeks, during which he rejected an initial offer to join Wigan — "I didn't think I was their sort of player" — Newlove said that his first goal was to start paying back the fee in the Stones Championship home match, against Workington, on Sunday.

St Helens, significantly, did not use any of their Super League money to finance the Newlove transfer. Some of the early spending of the £87 million investment over five years in the British game has been to consolidate rather than speculate, in the form of more lucrative contracts by clubs to key players.

Bradford hope to sign another forward soon — a scrum half is an obvious priority — and the trickle of money into a dried-up transfer market will be as welcome as the rain now wetting local reservoirs. However, like football, more clubs are turning to cheaper overseas markets — South Pacific countries, especially.

Apart from Wigan's priceless collection, Newlove was the one player in the home market worth £500,000. His career try tally is 209 in 258 appearances. David Howes, the St Helens chief executive, said that Newlove's purchase showed that the club meant business in the Super League from next March, and a centre partnership with Scott Gibbs is an exciting prospect.

While bidding farewell to three of the club's most loyal servants — Loughlin, Nickle and Dwyer are likely to make their Bradford debuts tomorrow in the visit by Oldham — Eric Hughes welcomed arguably the world's best centre. "We're a top-four side, but this is about building towards future glory," the St Helens coach said.

Sanderson rises to challenge

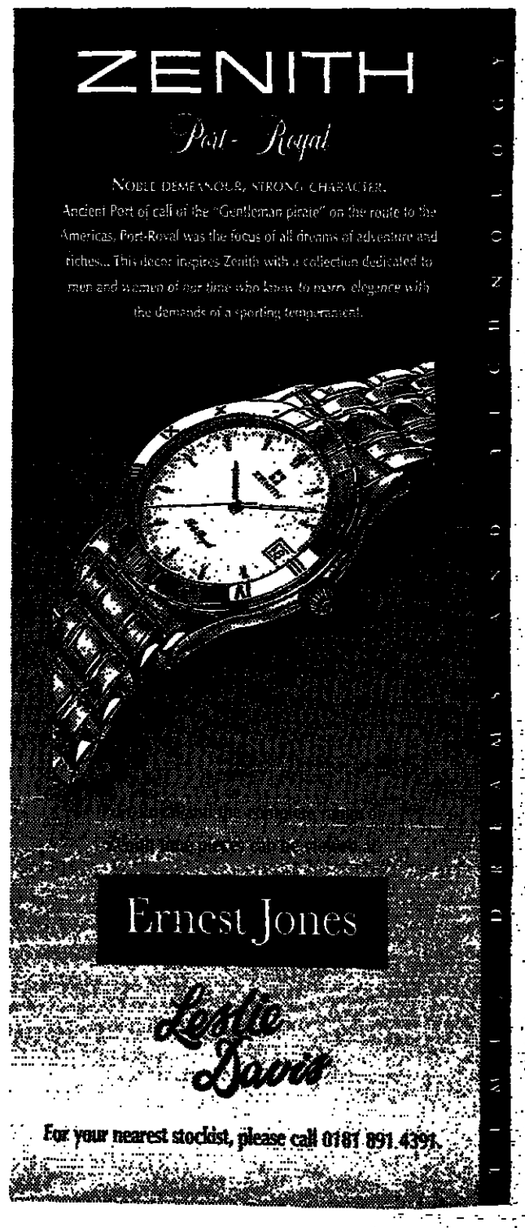

BY DAVID POWELL
ATHLETICS CORRESPONDENT

AFTER four weeks as Cinderella's fairy godmother this Christmas, Tessa Sanderson will exchange her magic wand for an Olympic torch. Sanderson has come out of retirement in an attempt to become the first British woman to compete in six Olympic Games.

If successful, she would equal the record number of Olympic appearances by any track and field athlete worldwide. Only two British men, Bill Hoskyns (fencing) and Paul Radmilovic (swimming and water polo), have competed in six Olympics while the world record is eight, by three equestrian competitors.

The odds must be on Sanderson succeeding. Although she will be 40 come Atlanta next July, British women's javelin throwing is in a parlous state and, in all probability, she would need only to achieve the Olympic qualifying distance of 60 metres. That should not be beyond a woman who, three years ago, won a World Cup gold medal, finished fourth in the Olympics and exceeded 63 metres eight times.

Sanderson, the 1984 Olympic champion, has been inspired to return by a project to raise £1 million for the Children in Hospital charity. She was approached by Sir Anthony Tippet, the charity's chairman, to head a fund-raising initiative, and Sanderson agreed that the best way to publicise the appeal would be to try for another Olympics. "I could not resist the challenge because I know how much difference it will make," Sanderson said.

Morse returns, in feisty and flirtatious form

Matthew Bond

If I were the controller of the ITV Network Centre, I would have just three items on my "things to do" list this morning. ...e: offer John Thaw, Kevin ...ately and Colin Dexter really ...ar amounts of money to keep ...king Inspector Morse (ITV) — a year would be fine, two ...ect.

...wo: vow never again to schedule two crime thrillers, which ...tually both boil down to child ...e, within 48 hours of each ... On Monday night Cracker ...ed a murderer who killed ...e she had not been abused ...father. Rather more conven... (not to mention credibly), ...ouement of last night's ...r Morse involved someone ...d. Slip up in a similar ...again, Mr Controller, and ...e might think you weren't ...the scripts.

... brings us to item three: ...o earnestly pray, that nobody should think the scheduling of the two dramas was deliberate, designed to reap maximum impact from recent events in the ghastly real world. That would be unforgivable. But let us be charitable, put it down, as Morse might, to unfortunate synchronism.

Inspector Morse was back — bigger and better than before and with its central character (Thaw) curiously more passionate. Not only did he shout at Sergeant Lewis (Whately) even more than usual but he was making amorous advances with the enthusiasm of an undergraduate, having apparently forgotten that it is writ in Cotswold stone that he is for ever unlucky in love. So it eventually proved but only after enough evidence to convince us that the old chap was on hormone replacement therapy. Under that crumpled exterior nestled a heart of warm flint — and a testosterone patch.

But Russell Lewis's adaptation of Dexter's novel needed no such stimulus. At feature film length, the pace was gentle, no doubt to the delight of those playing spot the college (Exeter doubling as Lonsdale), spot the author (I failed — Dexter, as is his Hitchcockian wont, was somewhere in the audience for the opening garden concert apparently) and spot whodunnit or rather, as it was by the blood-spattered end, spot whodunnthem.

But if the pace was gentle, the plot was positively labyrinthine. The mystery of Karen Anderson was eventually solved but only after Morse had guessed wrong three times and been taken off the case twice. As the final credits rolled with the part of "loose ends" unacknowledged, I briefly considered a charge of wasting viewers' time. But it would never stand up in court, it had all been far too enjoyable for that.

Thaw, Whately and James Grout, as Chief Superintendent Strange, were on top form. Whately, aided and abetted by the script, brought new and welcome edge to Morse's much put upon sidekick — Bob as he was to the splendidly loathsome Johnson (Malcolm Storry), Robbie as he is to Mrs Lewis and "Lewis!" as he will always be to Morse. Their long overdue clash of wills was spectacularly well played by both men.

Convincingly cast throughout (although from the start there was something suspiciously good-looking about the Michaels), Chris Fairbanks was first-class as the deeply sinister, and short-lived, George Daley. Vivienne Ritchie and Clare Holman were charming and crushing respectively as Morse's flirtatious but ill-fated dinner date and the feisty and feminist pathologist.

But what of the future? Morse was characteristically pessimistic over dinner, comparing himself to a dinosaur, the last of the serious detectives. "When I have outlived my usefulness, I shall be phased out." As far as ITV is concerned, that day has not yet dawned.

When it comes to travel, especially the long-haul variety — well, basically, I don't. I'm all for the television bringing places to me, as it did last night in Cities of the Future: Shanghai a GoGo (BBC2), which turned out to be in two parts — the first fascinating, the second a little less so.

The first was a spectacular catching-up exercise in what is going on in that distant part of the world. Freed from the economic corsets of Peking, Shanghai is once again booming and is in the grip of the type of development activity that makes London's Docklands look like a weekend DIY project. Not much of the architecture of downtown PuDong would have met with the approval of the Prince of Wales but the scale of ambition was made enthusiastically clear by many of those participating and sharing in the new prosperity.

But inevitably, and in fairness probably unavoidably, we then slipped into what is being lost in the course of all this Western-style progress. In a city where the anthem of the moment is apparently Go West by the Pet Shop Boys, there were no prizes for guessing the casualties — low-rise, traditional housing (or slums as they are known until the day they are knocked down) and Chinese culture. Some thought the way forward lay with something called neo-Confucianism, others disagreed. I retired in neo-confusion.

As I do regularly from The Real Holiday Show (Channel 4), which continues to be one of the most unsettling programmes on television. For underneath the breezy, Gaby Roslin-enhanced exterior of home-made holiday videos there surely lurks a more sinister intent. Some would call juxtaposing the first camping holiday abroad enjoyed (or not) by a lorry driver and his family with the summertime adventurings of a bunch of Roedean schoolgirls let loose in Marbella balanced. Others might call it cruel. But neo-confused or not, it's all strangely watchable.

Secret Lives: Marie Stopes
Channel 4, 9.00pm

A reappraisal of the pioneer of birth control bristles with paradox. She wrote her famous manual, Married Love, while still a virgin. She made married life happier for many other women but her own marriages were disastrous. Although promoting the institution of marriage, she took a series of lovers with her second husband's connivance. Her campaign for birth control helped women to avoid unwanted pregnancies. But Stopes had a darker motive. Convinced that the human species was degenerating, she advocated controlled breeding to eliminate the weaker strains in society. In this she echoed Hitler, to whom, a week before the Second World War broke out, she sent a book of her poems. He did not reply.

Can Allen Johnson beat Mr Perfect? (ITV, 7.30pm)

Peak Performance: Blink — and It's Gone
ITV, 7.30pm

Allen Johnson was little known outside his native United States when at Gothenburg this year he won the 110 metre hurdles at the athletics World Championships. Later he beat Colin Jackson of Britain, an absentee from Gothenburg, though he just failed to lower Jackson's world record time. In the first of a series about sportsmen pushing towards ever higher levels of achievement, we follow Johnson's attempts to get fitter and go faster. He uses science to do it, which makes the film somewhat technical, though slow motion photography helps to explain such concepts as "rotary running" and "explosive power". Finally, Johnson matches himself against Mr Perfect, a computer simulation of the ideal hurdler.

Doctors in the Dock: Conduct Unbecoming
BBC2, 10.00pm (Scotland, 9.30pm)

The colourful career of Dr Dick Richards came abruptly to a halt in 1983 when he was accused in California of plotting to murder his Harley Street partner. He spent two years in prison and on returning to Britain was struck off the medical register. The story is extraordinary even by the standards of this series. Richards worked as a sex therapist with a bogus doctor called Peter Stephan and is alleged to have paid one of Stephan's business partners to kill him. From Cyprus, Richards offers his version of events. He admits he behaved like an idiot. But he reckons he was a good doctor and he questions whether he should have been struck off for something which had nothing to do with his medical ability.

Ennio Morricone — Maestro of the Movies
BBC2, 11.25pm

"Film music you cannot hear", says Ennio Morricone, the Italian composer of hundreds of cinema scores, "is bad film music." Only the most insensitive of filmgoers could fail to register Morricone's work. He made his name with dynamic backings for the spaghetti westerns directed by his fellow-countryman and former schoolmate, Sergio Leone. On A Fistful of Dollars and its successors, their collaboration produced a potent mix of music and image. Morricone went on to work with Bernardo Bertolucci, Brian De Palma and John Boorman, all of whom offer their tributes. Another admirer, David Puttman, describes how he managed to persuade a reluctant Morricone to write the music for The Mission. Peter Waymark
